R esearch and Hong Kong

Gordon de Brouwer

mailto:gordon.debrouwer@anu.edu.au

Executive Director Australia-Japan Research Centre

The Australian National University

Hong Kong, 03/10/08

HKLNA-Project -- The beginning of a solution

Dear Professor De Brouwer,

Twelve years on the ground in East Asia has taught me that the world is not yet ready for a universally shared common language. In the simplest of terms there are too many people learning English to provide adequate training to non-native speakers and insufficient real demand to help them sustain what they have learned after having been trained. Moreover, there are too few people learning the languages of non-English speaking peoples to provide a sufficiently strong foundation for good crosscultural communication and understanding. As a result the overall quality of the English language has suffered, East Asian languages have been neglected, and understanding between peoples of East Asia and the West has been impaired. The obvious solution to this problem is to remove the artificial demand for English language created by East Asian governments and the language's global proponents. Unfortunately, those who are in the best position to remove this excess demand and consequent poor quality oversupply are the least inclined to do so.

In order to start the ball rolling I have created the Hong Kong Language Needs Assessment Project.

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/index.html

Although dedicated almost entirely to Hong Kong, the project has important implications for the rest of East Asia, where I hope someday to move it forward under a different name. The purpose of the project is to assess the real use and need of the English language in Hong Kong and eventually other East Asian societies and thereby provide policy makers and individual citizens with the information they require to make proper choices with regard to English language training and learning. The first important stage of this project is research, and it is to this end that the following proposal was developed and money, or alternatively employment, is now being sought

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/documents/proposals/030828-1.pdf

Please consider the project and research proposal carefully and think about ways

East Asian Research and Translation in Hong Kong

I am looking forward to your timely response.

Sincerely,

Peter Drysdale

mailto: peter.drysdale@anu.edu.au
Professor of Economics
Australia-Japan Research Centre
The Australian National University

Hong Kong, 03/10/08

HKLNA-Project -- The beginning of a solution

Dear Professor Drysdale,

Twelve years on the ground in East Asia has taught me that the world is not yet ready for a universally shared common language. In the simplest of terms there are too many people learning English to provide adequate training to non-native speakers and insufficient real demand to help them sustain what they have learned after having been trained. Moreover, there are too few people learning the languages of non-English speaking peoples to provide a sufficiently strong foundation for good cross-cultural communication and understanding. As a result the overall quality of the English language has suffered, East Asian languages have been neglected, and understanding between peoples of East Asia and the West has been impaired. The obvious solution to this problem is to remove the artificial demand for English language created by East Asian governments and the language's global proponents. Unfortunately, those who are in the best position to remove this excess demand and consequent poor quality oversupply are the least inclined to do so.

In order to start the ball rolling I have created the Hong Kong Language Needs Assessment Project.

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/index.html

Although dedicated almost entirely to Hong Kong, the project has important implications for the rest of East Asia, where I hope someday to move it forward under a different name. The purpose of the project is to assess the real use and need of the English language in Hong Kong and eventually other East Asian societies and thereby provide policy makers and individual citizens with the information they require to make proper choices with regard to English language training and learning. The first important stage of this project is research, and it is to this end that the following proposal was developed and money, or alternatively employment, is now being sought

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/documents/proposals/030828-1.pdf

Please consider the project and research proposal carefully and think about ways

East Asian Research and Translation in Hong Kong

I am looking forward to your timely response.

Sincerely,

Jenny Corbett

mailto: jenny.corbett@anu.edu.au
Professor of Japanese Studies
Australia-Japan Research Centre
The Australian National University

Hong Kong, 03/10/08

HKLNA-Project -- The beginning of a solution

Dear Professor Corbett,

Twelve years on the ground in East Asia has taught me that the world is not yet ready for a universally shared common language. In the simplest of terms there are too many people learning English to provide adequate training to non-native speakers and insufficient real demand to help them sustain what they have learned after having been trained. Moreover, there are too few people learning the languages of non-English speaking peoples to provide a sufficiently strong foundation for good cross-cultural communication and understanding. As a result the overall quality of the English language has suffered, East Asian languages have been neglected, and understanding between peoples of East Asia and the West has been impaired. The obvious solution to this problem is to remove the artificial demand for English language created by East Asian governments and the language's global proponents. Unfortunately, those who are in the best position to remove this excess demand and consequent poor quality oversupply are the least inclined to do so.

In order to start the ball rolling I have created the Hong Kong Language Needs Assessment Project.

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/index.html

Although dedicated almost entirely to Hong Kong, the project has important implications for the rest of East Asia, where I hope someday to move it forward under a different name. The purpose of the project is to assess the real use and need of the English language in Hong Kong and eventually other East Asian societies and thereby provide policy makers and individual citizens with the information they require to make proper choices with regard to English language training and learning. The first important stage of this project is research, and it is to this end that the following proposal was developed and money, or alternatively employment, is now being sought

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/documents/proposals/030828-1.pdf

Please consider the project and research proposal carefully and think about ways

East Asian Research and Translation in Hong Kong

I am looking forward to your timely response.

Sincerely,

Christopher Findlay

mailto: christopher.findlay@anu.edu.au
Professor of Economics
Australia-Japan Research Centre
The Australian National University

Hong Kong, 03/10/08

HKLNA-Project -- The beginning of a solution

Dear Professor Findlay,

Twelve years on the ground in East Asia has taught me that the world is not yet ready for a universally shared common language. In the simplest of terms there are too many people learning English to provide adequate training to non-native speakers and insufficient real demand to help them sustain what they have learned after having been trained. Moreover, there are too few people learning the languages of non-English speaking peoples to provide a sufficiently strong foundation for good cross-cultural communication and understanding. As a result the overall quality of the English language has suffered, East Asian languages have been neglected, and understanding between peoples of East Asia and the West has been impaired. The obvious solution to this problem is to remove the artificial demand for English language created by East Asian governments and the language's global proponents. Unfortunately, those who are in the best position to remove this excess demand and consequent poor quality oversupply are the least inclined to do so.

In order to start the ball rolling I have created the Hong Kong Language Needs Assessment Project.

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/index.html

Although dedicated almost entirely to Hong Kong, the project has important implications for the rest of East Asia, where I hope someday to move it forward under a different name. The purpose of the project is to assess the real use and need of the English language in Hong Kong and eventually other East Asian societies and thereby provide policy makers and individual citizens with the information they require to make proper choices with regard to English language training and learning. The first important stage of this project is research, and it is to this end that the following proposal was developed and money, or alternatively employment, is now being sought

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/documents/proposals/030828-1.pdf

Please consider the project and research proposal carefully and think about ways

East Asian Research and Translation in Hong Kong

I am looking forward to your timely response.

Sincerely,

Song Li Gang

mailto: ligang.song@anu.edu.au
Research Fellow
Australia-Japan Research Centre The Australian National University

Hong Kong, 03/10/08

HKLNA-Project -- The beginning of a solution

Dear Dr. Song,

Twelve years on the ground in East Asia has taught me that the world is not yet ready for a universally shared common language. In the simplest of terms there are too many people learning English to provide adequate training to non-native speakers and insufficient real demand to help them sustain what they have learned after having been trained. Moreover, there are too few people learning the languages of non-English speaking peoples to provide a sufficiently strong foundation for good cross-cultural communication and understanding. As a result the overall quality of the English language has suffered, East Asian languages have been neglected, and understanding between peoples of East Asia and the West has been impaired. The obvious solution to this problem is to remove the artificial demand for English language created by East Asian governments and the language's global proponents. Unfortunately, those who are in the best position to remove this excess demand and consequent poor quality oversupply are the least inclined to do so.

In order to start the ball rolling I have created the Hong Kong Language Needs Assessment Project.

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/index.html

Although dedicated almost entirely to Hong Kong, the project has important implications for the rest of East Asia, where I hope someday to move it forward under a different name. The purpose of the project is to assess the real use and need of the English language in Hong Kong and eventually other East Asian societies and thereby provide policy makers and individual citizens with the information they require to make proper choices with regard to English language training and learning. The first important stage of this project is research, and it is to this end that the following proposal was developed and money, or alternatively employment, is now being sought

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/documents/proposals/030828-1.pdf

Please consider the project and research proposal carefully and think about ways

East Asian Research and Translation in Hong Kong

I am looking forward to your timely response.

Sincerely,

Alexandra Sidorenko

mailto: alexandra.sidorenko@anu.edu.au

Postdoctoral Fellow Australia-Japan Research Centre The Australian National University

Hong Kong, 03/10/08

HKLNA-Project -- The beginning of a solution

Dear Dr. Sidorenko,

Twelve years on the ground in East Asia has taught me that the world is not yet ready for a universally shared common language. In the simplest of terms there are too many people learning English to provide adequate training to non-native speakers and insufficient real demand to help them sustain what they have learned after having been trained. Moreover, there are too few people learning the languages of non-English speaking peoples to provide a sufficiently strong foundation for good cross-cultural communication and understanding. As a result the overall quality of the English language has suffered, East Asian languages have been neglected, and understanding between peoples of East Asia and the West has been impaired. The obvious solution to this problem is to remove the artificial demand for English language created by East Asian governments and the language's global proponents. Unfortunately, those who are in the best position to remove this excess demand and consequent poor quality oversupply are the least inclined to do so.

In order to start the ball rolling I have created the Hong Kong Language Needs Assessment Project.

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/index.html

Although dedicated almost entirely to Hong Kong, the project has important implications for the rest of East Asia, where I hope someday to move it forward under a different name. The purpose of the project is to assess the real use and need of the English language in Hong Kong and eventually other East Asian societies and thereby provide policy makers and individual citizens with the information they require to make proper choices with regard to English language training and learning. The first important stage of this project is research, and it is to this end that the following proposal was developed and money, or alternatively employment, is now being sought

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/documents/proposals/030828-1.pdf

Please consider the project and research proposal carefully and think about ways

East Asian Research and Translation in Hong Kong

I am looking forward to your timely response.

Sincerely,

Malcolm Bosworth

mailto: malcolm.bosworth@anu.edu.au

Visiting Fellow

Australia-Japan Research Centre

The Australian National University

Hong Kong, 03/10/08

HKLNA-Project -- The beginning of a solution

Dear Dr. Bosworth,

Twelve years on the ground in East Asia has taught me that the world is not yet ready for a universally shared common language. In the simplest of terms there are too many people learning English to provide adequate training to non-native speakers and insufficient real demand to help them sustain what they have learned after having been trained. Moreover, there are too few people learning the languages of non-English speaking peoples to provide a sufficiently strong foundation for good cross-cultural communication and understanding. As a result the overall quality of the English language has suffered, East Asian languages have been neglected, and understanding between peoples of East Asia and the West has been impaired. The obvious solution to this problem is to remove the artificial demand for English language created by East Asian governments and the language's global proponents. Unfortunately, those who are in the best position to remove this excess demand and consequent poor quality oversupply are the least inclined to do so.

In order to start the ball rolling I have created the Hong Kong Language Needs Assessment Project.

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/index.html

Although dedicated almost entirely to Hong Kong, the project has important implications for the rest of East Asia, where I hope someday to move it forward under a different name. The purpose of the project is to assess the real use and need of the English language in Hong Kong and eventually other East Asian societies and thereby provide policy makers and individual citizens with the information they require to make proper choices with regard to English language training and learning. The first important stage of this project is research, and it is to this end that the following proposal was developed and money, or alternatively employment, is now being sought

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/documents/proposals/030828-1.pdf

Please consider the project and research proposal carefully and think about ways

East Asian Research and Translation in Hong Kong

I am looking forward to your timely response.

Sincerely,

Mandy Thomas

mailto: Mandy. Thomas@anu.edu.au

Deputy Director The Centre for Cross-cultural Research

The Australian National University

Hong Kong, 03/10/08

HKLNA-Project -- The beginning of a solution

Dear Dr. Thomas,

Twelve years on the ground in East Asia has taught me that the world is not yet ready for a universally shared common language. In the simplest of terms there are too many people learning English to provide adequate training to non-native speakers and insufficient real demand to help them sustain what they have learned after having been trained. Moreover, there are too few people learning the languages of non-English speaking peoples to provide a sufficiently strong foundation for good cross-cultural communication and understanding. As a result the overall quality of the English language has suffered, East Asian languages have been neglected, and understanding between peoples of East Asia and the West has been impaired. The obvious solution to this problem is to remove the artificial demand for English language created by East Asian governments and the language's global proponents. Unfortunately, those who are in the best position to remove this excess demand and consequent poor quality oversupply are the least inclined to do so.

In order to start the ball rolling I have created the Hong Kong Language Needs Assessment Project.

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/index.html

Although dedicated almost entirely to Hong Kong, the project has important implications for the rest of East Asia, where I hope someday to move it forward under a different name. The purpose of the project is to assess the real use and need of the English language in Hong Kong and eventually other East Asian societies and thereby provide policy makers and individual citizens with the information they require to make proper choices with regard to English language training and learning. The first important stage of this project is research, and it is to this end that the following proposal was developed and money, or alternatively employment, is now being sought

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/documents/proposals/030828-1.pdf

Please consider the project and research proposal carefully and think about ways

East Asian Research and Translation in Hong Kong

I am looking forward to your timely response.

Sincerely,

Anne-Maree O'Brien

mailto: Anne-Maree. OBrien@anu.edu.au
Executive Officer
The Centre for Cross-cultural Research
The Australian National University

Hong Kong, 03/10/08

HKLNA-Project -- The beginning of a solution

Dear Ms. O'Brien,

Twelve years on the ground in East Asia has taught me that the world is not yet ready for a universally shared common language. In the simplest of terms there are too many people learning English to provide adequate training to non-native speakers and insufficient real demand to help them sustain what they have learned after having been trained. Moreover, there are too few people learning the languages of non-English speaking peoples to provide a sufficiently strong foundation for good cross-cultural communication and understanding. As a result the overall quality of the English language has suffered, East Asian languages have been neglected, and understanding between peoples of East Asia and the West has been impaired. The obvious solution to this problem is to remove the artificial demand for English language created by East Asian governments and the language's global proponents. Unfortunately, those who are in the best position to remove this excess demand and consequent poor quality oversupply are the least inclined to do so.

In order to start the ball rolling I have created the Hong Kong Language Needs Assessment Project.

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/index.html

Although dedicated almost entirely to Hong Kong, the project has important implications for the rest of East Asia, where I hope someday to move it forward under a different name. The purpose of the project is to assess the real use and need of the English language in Hong Kong and eventually other East Asian societies and thereby provide policy makers and individual citizens with the information they require to make proper choices with regard to English language training and learning. The first important stage of this project is research, and it is to this end that the following proposal was developed and money, or alternatively employment, is now being sought

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/documents/proposals/030828-1.pdf

Please consider the project and research proposal carefully and think about ways

East Asian Research and Translation in Hong Kong

I am looking forward to your timely response.

Sincerely,

Chris Blackall

mailto: Chris. Blackall@anu.edu.au

ARC Senior Research Associate
The Centre for Cross-cultural Research
The Australian National University

Hong Kong, 03/10/08

HKLNA-Project -- The beginning of a solution

Dear Mr. Blackall,

Twelve years on the ground in East Asia has taught me that the world is not yet ready for a universally shared common language. In the simplest of terms there are too many people learning English to provide adequate training to non-native speakers and insufficient real demand to help them sustain what they have learned after having been trained. Moreover, there are too few people learning the languages of non-English speaking peoples to provide a sufficiently strong foundation for good cross-cultural communication and understanding. As a result the overall quality of the English language has suffered, East Asian languages have been neglected, and understanding between peoples of East Asia and the West has been impaired. The obvious solution to this problem is to remove the artificial demand for English language created by East Asian governments and the language's global proponents. Unfortunately, those who are in the best position to remove this excess demand and consequent poor quality oversupply are the least inclined to do so.

In order to start the ball rolling I have created the Hong Kong Language Needs Assessment Project.

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/index.html

Although dedicated almost entirely to Hong Kong, the project has important implications for the rest of East Asia, where I hope someday to move it forward under a different name. The purpose of the project is to assess the real use and need of the English language in Hong Kong and eventually other East Asian societies and thereby provide policy makers and individual citizens with the information they require to make proper choices with regard to English language training and learning. The first important stage of this project is research, and it is to this end that the following proposal was developed and money, or alternatively employment, is now being sought

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/documents/proposals/030828-1.pdf

Please consider the project and research proposal carefully and think about ways

East Asian Research and Translation in Hong Kong

I am looking forward to your timely response.

Sincerely,

Celia Bridgewater

mailto: Celia.Bridgewater@anu.edu.au

Project Officer
The Centre for Cross-cultural Research
The Australian National University

Hong Kong, 03/10/08

HKLNA-Project -- The beginning of a solution

Dear Ms. Bridgewater,

Twelve years on the ground in East Asia has taught me that the world is not yet ready for a universally shared common language. In the simplest of terms there are too many people learning English to provide adequate training to non-native speakers and insufficient real demand to help them sustain what they have learned after having been trained. Moreover, there are too few people learning the languages of non-English speaking peoples to provide a sufficiently strong foundation for good cross-cultural communication and understanding. As a result the overall quality of the English language has suffered, East Asian languages have been neglected, and understanding between peoples of East Asia and the West has been impaired. The obvious solution to this problem is to remove the artificial demand for English language created by East Asian governments and the language's global proponents. Unfortunately, those who are in the best position to remove this excess demand and consequent poor quality oversupply are the least inclined to do so.

In order to start the ball rolling I have created the Hong Kong Language Needs Assessment Project.

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/index.html

Although dedicated almost entirely to Hong Kong, the project has important implications for the rest of East Asia, where I hope someday to move it forward under a different name. The purpose of the project is to assess the real use and need of the English language in Hong Kong and eventually other East Asian societies and thereby provide policy makers and individual citizens with the information they require to make proper choices with regard to English language training and learning. The first important stage of this project is research, and it is to this end that the following proposal was developed and money, or alternatively employment, is now being sought

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/documents/proposals/030828-1.pdf

Please consider the project and research proposal carefully and think about ways

East Asian Research and Translation in Hong Kong

I am looking forward to your timely response.

Sincerely,

Mary Edmunds

mailto: Mary. Edmunds@anu.edu.au

Fellow

The Centre for Cross-cultural Research

The Australian National University

Hong Kong, 03/10/08

HKLNA-Project -- The beginning of a solution

Dear Dr. Edmunds,

Twelve years on the ground in East Asia has taught me that the world is not yet ready for a universally shared common language. In the simplest of terms there are too many people learning English to provide adequate training to non-native speakers and insufficient real demand to help them sustain what they have learned after having been trained. Moreover, there are too few people learning the languages of non-English speaking peoples to provide a sufficiently strong foundation for good cross-cultural communication and understanding. As a result the overall quality of the English language has suffered, East Asian languages have been neglected, and understanding between peoples of East Asia and the West has been impaired. The obvious solution to this problem is to remove the artificial demand for English language created by East Asian governments and the language's global proponents. Unfortunately, those who are in the best position to remove this excess demand and consequent poor quality oversupply are the least inclined to do so.

In order to start the ball rolling I have created the Hong Kong Language Needs Assessment Project.

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/index.html

Although dedicated almost entirely to Hong Kong, the project has important implications for the rest of East Asia, where I hope someday to move it forward under a different name. The purpose of the project is to assess the real use and need of the English language in Hong Kong and eventually other East Asian societies and thereby provide policy makers and individual citizens with the information they require to make proper choices with regard to English language training and learning. The first important stage of this project is research, and it is to this end that the following proposal was developed and money, or alternatively employment, is now being sought

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/documents/proposals/030828-1.pdf

Please consider the project and research proposal carefully and think about ways

East Asian Research and Translation in Hong Kong

I am looking forward to your timely response.

Sincerely,

Maria-Suzette Fernandes Dias

mailto: maria-suzette.fernandesdias@anu.edu.au

Executive Support Officer
The Centre for Cross-cultural Research
The Australian National University

Hong Kong, 03/10/08

HKLNA-Project -- The beginning of a solution

Dear Dr. Fernandes,

Twelve years on the ground in East Asia has taught me that the world is not yet ready for a universally shared common language. In the simplest of terms there are too many people learning English to provide adequate training to non-native speakers and insufficient real demand to help them sustain what they have learned after having been trained. Moreover, there are too few people learning the languages of non-English speaking peoples to provide a sufficiently strong foundation for good cross-cultural communication and understanding. As a result the overall quality of the English language has suffered, East Asian languages have been neglected, and understanding between peoples of East Asia and the West has been impaired. The obvious solution to this problem is to remove the artificial demand for English language created by East Asian governments and the language's global proponents. Unfortunately, those who are in the best position to remove this excess demand and consequent poor quality oversupply are the least inclined to do so.

In order to start the ball rolling I have created the Hong Kong Language Needs Assessment Project.

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/index.html

Although dedicated almost entirely to Hong Kong, the project has important implications for the rest of East Asia, where I hope someday to move it forward under a different name. The purpose of the project is to assess the real use and need of the English language in Hong Kong and eventually other East Asian societies and thereby provide policy makers and individual citizens with the information they require to make proper choices with regard to English language training and learning. The first important stage of this project is research, and it is to this end that the following proposal was developed and money, or alternatively employment, is now being sought

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/documents/proposals/030828-1.pdf

Please consider the project and research proposal carefully and think about ways

East Asian Research and Translation in Hong Kong

I am looking forward to your timely response.

Sincerely,

William Maley

mailto: william.maley@anu.edu.au
Foundation Director
Asia Pacific College of Diplomacy
The Australian National University

Hong Kong, 03/10/08

HKLNA-Project -- The beginning of a solution

Dear Professor Maley,

Twelve years on the ground in East Asia has taught me that the world is not yet ready for a universally shared common language. In the simplest of terms there are too many people learning English to provide adequate training to non-native speakers and insufficient real demand to help them sustain what they have learned after having been trained. Moreover, there are too few people learning the languages of non-English speaking peoples to provide a sufficiently strong foundation for good cross-cultural communication and understanding. As a result the overall quality of the English language has suffered, East Asian languages have been neglected, and understanding between peoples of East Asia and the West has been impaired. The obvious solution to this problem is to remove the artificial demand for English language created by East Asian governments and the language's global proponents. Unfortunately, those who are in the best position to remove this excess demand and consequent poor quality oversupply are the least inclined to do so.

In order to start the ball rolling I have created the Hong Kong Language Needs Assessment Project.

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/index.html

Although dedicated almost entirely to Hong Kong, the project has important implications for the rest of East Asia, where I hope someday to move it forward under a different name. The purpose of the project is to assess the real use and need of the English language in Hong Kong and eventually other East Asian societies and thereby provide policy makers and individual citizens with the information they require to make proper choices with regard to English language training and learning. The first important stage of this project is research, and it is to this end that the following proposal was developed and money, or alternatively employment, is now being sought

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/documents/proposals/030828-1.pdf

Please consider the project and research proposal carefully and think about ways

East Asian Research and Translation in Hong Kong

I am looking forward to your timely response.

Sincerely,

Jonathan Unger

mailto: Jonathan. Unger@anu.edu.au
Centre Head
Contempory China Centre
The Australian National University

Hong Kong, 03/10/08

HKLNA-Project -- The beginning of a solution

Dear Professor Unger,

Twelve years on the ground in East Asia has taught me that the world is not yet ready for a universally shared common language. In the simplest of terms there are too many people learning English to provide adequate training to non-native speakers and insufficient real demand to help them sustain what they have learned after having been trained. Moreover, there are too few people learning the languages of non-English speaking peoples to provide a sufficiently strong foundation for good cross-cultural communication and understanding. As a result the overall quality of the English language has suffered, East Asian languages have been neglected, and understanding between peoples of East Asia and the West has been impaired. The obvious solution to this problem is to remove the artificial demand for English language created by East Asian governments and the language's global proponents. Unfortunately, those who are in the best position to remove this excess demand and consequent poor quality oversupply are the least inclined to do so.

In order to start the ball rolling I have created the Hong Kong Language Needs Assessment Project.

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/index.html

Although dedicated almost entirely to Hong Kong, the project has important implications for the rest of East Asia, where I hope someday to move it forward under a different name. The purpose of the project is to assess the real use and need of the English language in Hong Kong and eventually other East Asian societies and thereby provide policy makers and individual citizens with the information they require to make proper choices with regard to English language training and learning. The first important stage of this project is research, and it is to this end that the following proposal was developed and money, or alternatively employment, is now being sought

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/documents/proposals/030828-1.pdf

Please consider the project and research proposal carefully and think about ways

East Asian Research and Translation in Hong Kong

I am looking forward to your timely response.

Sincerely,

Andrew Kipnis

mailto: andrew.kipnis@anu.edu.au

Research Fellow

Contempory China Centre

The Australian National University

Hong Kong, 03/10/08

HKLNA-Project -- The beginning of a solution

Dear Dr. Kipnis,

Twelve years on the ground in East Asia has taught me that the world is not yet ready for a universally shared common language. In the simplest of terms there are too many people learning English to provide adequate training to non-native speakers and insufficient real demand to help them sustain what they have learned after having been trained. Moreover, there are too few people learning the languages of non-English speaking peoples to provide a sufficiently strong foundation for good cross-cultural communication and understanding. As a result the overall quality of the English language has suffered, East Asian languages have been neglected, and understanding between peoples of East Asia and the West has been impaired. The obvious solution to this problem is to remove the artificial demand for English language created by East Asian governments and the language's global proponents. Unfortunately, those who are in the best position to remove this excess demand and consequent poor quality oversupply are the least inclined to do so.

In order to start the ball rolling I have created the Hong Kong Language Needs Assessment Project.

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/index.html

Although dedicated almost entirely to Hong Kong, the project has important implications for the rest of East Asia, where I hope someday to move it forward under a different name. The purpose of the project is to assess the real use and need of the English language in Hong Kong and eventually other East Asian societies and thereby provide policy makers and individual citizens with the information they require to make proper choices with regard to English language training and learning. The first important stage of this project is research, and it is to this end that the following proposal was developed and money, or alternatively employment, is now being sought

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/documents/proposals/030828-1.pdf

Please consider the project and research proposal carefully and think about ways

East Asian Research and Translation in Hong Kong

I am looking forward to your timely response.

Sincerely,

Luigi Tomba

mailto: luigi.tomba@anu.edu.au
Research Fellow
Contempory China Centre The Australian National University

Hong Kong, 03/10/08

HKLNA-Project -- The beginning of a solution

Dear Dr. Tomba,

Twelve years on the ground in East Asia has taught me that the world is not yet ready for a universally shared common language. In the simplest of terms there are too many people learning English to provide adequate training to non-native speakers and insufficient real demand to help them sustain what they have learned after having been trained. Moreover, there are too few people learning the languages of non-English speaking peoples to provide a sufficiently strong foundation for good cross-cultural communication and understanding. As a result the overall quality of the English language has suffered, East Asian languages have been neglected, and understanding between peoples of East Asia and the West has been impaired. The obvious solution to this problem is to remove the artificial demand for English language created by East Asian governments and the language's global proponents. Unfortunately, those who are in the best position to remove this excess demand and consequent poor quality oversupply are the least inclined to do so.

In order to start the ball rolling I have created the Hong Kong Language Needs Assessment Project.

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/index.html

Although dedicated almost entirely to Hong Kong, the project has important implications for the rest of East Asia, where I hope someday to move it forward under a different name. The purpose of the project is to assess the real use and need of the English language in Hong Kong and eventually other East Asian societies and thereby provide policy makers and individual citizens with the information they require to make proper choices with regard to English language training and learning. The first important stage of this project is research, and it is to this end that the following proposal was developed and money, or alternatively employment, is now being sought

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/documents/proposals/030828-1.pdf

Please consider the project and research proposal carefully and think about ways

East Asian Research and Translation in Hong Kong

I am looking forward to your timely response.

Sincerely,

Anita Chan

mailto: anita@coombs.anu.edu.au
Research Fellow
Contempory China Centre

The Australian National University

Hong Kong, 03/10/08

HKLNA-Project -- The beginning of a solution

Dear Dr. Chan,

Twelve years on the ground in East Asia has taught me that the world is not yet ready for a universally shared common language. In the simplest of terms there are too many people learning English to provide adequate training to non-native speakers and insufficient real demand to help them sustain what they have learned after having been trained. Moreover, there are too few people learning the languages of non-English speaking peoples to provide a sufficiently strong foundation for good cross-cultural communication and understanding. As a result the overall quality of the English language has suffered, East Asian languages have been neglected, and understanding between peoples of East Asia and the West has been impaired. The obvious solution to this problem is to remove the artificial demand for English language created by East Asian governments and the language's global proponents. Unfortunately, those who are in the best position to remove this excess demand and consequent poor quality oversupply are the least inclined to do so.

In order to start the ball rolling I have created the Hong Kong Language Needs Assessment Project.

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/index.html

Although dedicated almost entirely to Hong Kong, the project has important implications for the rest of East Asia, where I hope someday to move it forward under a different name. The purpose of the project is to assess the real use and need of the English language in Hong Kong and eventually other East Asian societies and thereby provide policy makers and individual citizens with the information they require to make proper choices with regard to English language training and learning. The first important stage of this project is research, and it is to this end that the following proposal was developed and money, or alternatively employment, is now being sought

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/documents/proposals/030828-1.pdf

Please consider the project and research proposal carefully and think about ways

East Asian Research and Translation in Hong Kong

I am looking forward to your timely response.

Sincerely,

Peter van Ness

mailto: peter.van-ness@anu.edu.au
Visiting Fellow
Contempory China Centre
The Australian National University

Hong Kong, 03/10/08

HKLNA-Project -- The beginning of a solution

Dear Dr. Van Ness,

Twelve years on the ground in East Asia has taught me that the world is not yet ready for a universally shared common language. In the simplest of terms there are too many people learning English to provide adequate training to non-native speakers and insufficient real demand to help them sustain what they have learned after having been trained. Moreover, there are too few people learning the languages of non-English speaking peoples to provide a sufficiently strong foundation for good cross-cultural communication and understanding. As a result the overall quality of the English language has suffered, East Asian languages have been neglected, and understanding between peoples of East Asia and the West has been impaired. The obvious solution to this problem is to remove the artificial demand for English language created by East Asian governments and the language's global proponents. Unfortunately, those who are in the best position to remove this excess demand and consequent poor quality oversupply are the least inclined to do so.

In order to start the ball rolling I have created the Hong Kong Language Needs Assessment Project.

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/index.html

Although dedicated almost entirely to Hong Kong, the project has important implications for the rest of East Asia, where I hope someday to move it forward under a different name. The purpose of the project is to assess the real use and need of the English language in Hong Kong and eventually other East Asian societies and thereby provide policy makers and individual citizens with the information they require to make proper choices with regard to English language training and learning. The first important stage of this project is research, and it is to this end that the following proposal was developed and money, or alternatively employment, is now being sought

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/documents/proposals/030828-1.pdf

Please consider the project and research proposal carefully and think about ways

East Asian Research and Translation in Hong Kong

I am looking forward to your timely response.

Sincerely,

Andrew K. Pawley

mailto: apawley@coombs.anu.edu.au
Head of Department
Department of Linguistics
The Australian National University

Hong Kong, 03/10/08

HKLNA-Project -- The beginning of a solution

Dear Professor Pawley,

Twelve years on the ground in East Asia has taught me that the world is not yet ready for a universally shared common language. In the simplest of terms there are too many people learning English to provide adequate training to non-native speakers and insufficient real demand to help them sustain what they have learned after having been trained. Moreover, there are too few people learning the languages of non-English speaking peoples to provide a sufficiently strong foundation for good cross-cultural communication and understanding. As a result the overall quality of the English language has suffered, East Asian languages have been neglected, and understanding between peoples of East Asia and the West has been impaired. The obvious solution to this problem is to remove the artificial demand for English language created by East Asian governments and the language's global proponents. Unfortunately, those who are in the best position to remove this excess demand and consequent poor quality oversupply are the least inclined to do so.

In order to start the ball rolling I have created the Hong Kong Language Needs Assessment Project.

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/index.html

Although dedicated almost entirely to Hong Kong, the project has important implications for the rest of East Asia, where I hope someday to move it forward under a different name. The purpose of the project is to assess the real use and need of the English language in Hong Kong and eventually other East Asian societies and thereby provide policy makers and individual citizens with the information they require to make proper choices with regard to English language training and learning. The first important stage of this project is research, and it is to this end that the following proposal was developed and money, or alternatively employment, is now being sought

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/documents/proposals/030828-1.pdf

Please consider the project and research proposal carefully and think about ways

East Asian Research and Translation in Hong Kong

I am looking forward to your timely response.

Sincerely,

Malcolm Ross

mailto: malcolm.ross@anu.edu.au

Senior Fellow

Department of Linguistics

The Australian National University

Hong Kong, 03/10/08

HKLNA-Project -- The beginning of a solution

Dear Dr. Ross,

Twelve years on the ground in East Asia has taught me that the world is not yet ready for a universally shared common language. In the simplest of terms there are too many people learning English to provide adequate training to non-native speakers and insufficient real demand to help them sustain what they have learned after having been trained. Moreover, there are too few people learning the languages of non-English speaking peoples to provide a sufficiently strong foundation for good cross-cultural communication and understanding. As a result the overall quality of the English language has suffered, East Asian languages have been neglected, and understanding between peoples of East Asia and the West has been impaired. The obvious solution to this problem is to remove the artificial demand for English language created by East Asian governments and the language's global proponents. Unfortunately, those who are in the best position to remove this excess demand and consequent poor quality oversupply are the least inclined to do so.

In order to start the ball rolling I have created the Hong Kong Language Needs Assessment Project.

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/index.html

Although dedicated almost entirely to Hong Kong, the project has important implications for the rest of East Asia, where I hope someday to move it forward under a different name. The purpose of the project is to assess the real use and need of the English language in Hong Kong and eventually other East Asian societies and thereby provide policy makers and individual citizens with the information they require to make proper choices with regard to English language training and learning. The first important stage of this project is research, and it is to this end that the following proposal was developed and money, or alternatively employment, is now being sought

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/documents/proposals/030828-1.pdf

Please consider the project and research proposal carefully and think about ways

East Asian Research and Translation in Hong Kong

I am looking forward to your timely response.

Sincerely,

I Wayan Arka

mailto: Wayan. Arka@anu.edu.au
Research Fellow
Department of Linguistics
The Australian National University

Hong Kong, 03/10/08

HKLNA-Project -- The beginning of a solution

Dear Dr. Arka,

Twelve years on the ground in East Asia has taught me that the world is not yet ready for a universally shared common language. In the simplest of terms there are too many people learning English to provide adequate training to non-native speakers and insufficient real demand to help them sustain what they have learned after having been trained. Moreover, there are too few people learning the languages of non-English speaking peoples to provide a sufficiently strong foundation for good cross-cultural communication and understanding. As a result the overall quality of the English language has suffered, East Asian languages have been neglected, and understanding between peoples of East Asia and the West has been impaired. The obvious solution to this problem is to remove the artificial demand for English language created by East Asian governments and the language's global proponents. Unfortunately, those who are in the best position to remove this excess demand and consequent poor quality oversupply are the least inclined to do so.

In order to start the ball rolling I have created the Hong Kong Language Needs Assessment Project.

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/index.html

Although dedicated almost entirely to Hong Kong, the project has important implications for the rest of East Asia, where I hope someday to move it forward under a different name. The purpose of the project is to assess the real use and need of the English language in Hong Kong and eventually other East Asian societies and thereby provide policy makers and individual citizens with the information they require to make proper choices with regard to English language training and learning. The first important stage of this project is research, and it is to this end that the following proposal was developed and money, or alternatively employment, is now being sought

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/documents/proposals/030828-1.pdf

Please consider the project and research proposal carefully and think about ways

East Asian Research and Translation in Hong Kong

I am looking forward to your timely response.

Sincerely,

Paul James Sidwell

mailto: paul.sidwell@anu.edu.au
Postdoctoral Research Fellow
Department of Linguistics
The Australian National University

Hong Kong, 03/10/08

HKLNA-Project -- The beginning of a solution

Dear Dr. Sidwell,

Twelve years on the ground in East Asia has taught me that the world is not yet ready for a universally shared common language. In the simplest of terms there are too many people learning English to provide adequate training to non-native speakers and insufficient real demand to help them sustain what they have learned after having been trained. Moreover, there are too few people learning the languages of non-English speaking peoples to provide a sufficiently strong foundation for good cross-cultural communication and understanding. As a result the overall quality of the English language has suffered, East Asian languages have been neglected, and understanding between peoples of East Asia and the West has been impaired. The obvious solution to this problem is to remove the artificial demand for English language created by East Asian governments and the language's global proponents. Unfortunately, those who are in the best position to remove this excess demand and consequent poor quality oversupply are the least inclined to do so.

In order to start the ball rolling I have created the Hong Kong Language Needs Assessment Project.

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/index.html

Although dedicated almost entirely to Hong Kong, the project has important implications for the rest of East Asia, where I hope someday to move it forward under a different name. The purpose of the project is to assess the real use and need of the English language in Hong Kong and eventually other East Asian societies and thereby provide policy makers and individual citizens with the information they require to make proper choices with regard to English language training and learning. The first important stage of this project is research, and it is to this end that the following proposal was developed and money, or alternatively employment, is now being sought

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/documents/proposals/030828-1.pdf

Please consider the project and research proposal carefully and think about ways

East Asian Research and Translation in Hong Kong

I am looking forward to your timely response.

Sincerely,

George Fane

mailto: George.Fane@anu.edu.au

Professor, Division of Economics Research School of Pacific and Asian Studies

The Australian National University

Hong Kong, 03/10/08

HKLNA-Project -- The beginning of a solution

Dear Professor Fane,

Twelve years on the ground in East Asia has taught me that the world is not yet ready for a universally shared common language. In the simplest of terms there are too many people learning English to provide adequate training to non-native speakers and insufficient real demand to help them sustain what they have learned after having been trained. Moreover, there are too few people learning the languages of non-English speaking peoples to provide a sufficiently strong foundation for good cross-cultural communication and understanding. As a result the overall quality of the English language has suffered, East Asian languages have been neglected, and understanding between peoples of East Asia and the West has been impaired. The obvious solution to this problem is to remove the artificial demand for English language created by East Asian governments and the language's global proponents. Unfortunately, those who are in the best position to remove this excess demand and consequent poor quality oversupply are the least inclined to do so.

In order to start the ball rolling I have created the Hong Kong Language Needs Assessment Project.

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/index.html

Although dedicated almost entirely to Hong Kong, the project has important implications for the rest of East Asia, where I hope someday to move it forward under a different name. The purpose of the project is to assess the real use and need of the English language in Hong Kong and eventually other East Asian societies and thereby provide policy makers and individual citizens with the information they require to make proper choices with regard to English language training and learning. The first important stage of this project is research, and it is to this end that the following proposal was developed and money, or alternatively employment, is now being sought

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/documents/proposals/030828-1.pdf

Please consider the project and research proposal carefully and think about ways

East Asian Research and Translation in Hong Kong

I am looking forward to your timely response.

Sincerely,

Ross Garnaut

mailto: Ross. Garnaut@anu.edu.au
Professor of Economics
Research School of Pacific and Asian Studies
The Australian National University

Hong Kong, 03/10/08

HKLNA-Project -- The beginning of a solution

Dear Professor Garnaut,

Twelve years on the ground in East Asia has taught me that the world is not yet ready for a universally shared common language. In the simplest of terms there are too many people learning English to provide adequate training to non-native speakers and insufficient real demand to help them sustain what they have learned after having been trained. Moreover, there are too few people learning the languages of non-English speaking peoples to provide a sufficiently strong foundation for good cross-cultural communication and understanding. As a result the overall quality of the English language has suffered, East Asian languages have been neglected, and understanding between peoples of East Asia and the West has been impaired. The obvious solution to this problem is to remove the artificial demand for English language created by East Asian governments and the language's global proponents. Unfortunately, those who are in the best position to remove this excess demand and consequent poor quality oversupply are the least inclined to do so.

In order to start the ball rolling I have created the Hong Kong Language Needs Assessment Project.

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/index.html

Although dedicated almost entirely to Hong Kong, the project has important implications for the rest of East Asia, where I hope someday to move it forward under a different name. The purpose of the project is to assess the real use and need of the English language in Hong Kong and eventually other East Asian societies and thereby provide policy makers and individual citizens with the information they require to make proper choices with regard to English language training and learning. The first important stage of this project is research, and it is to this end that the following proposal was developed and money, or alternatively employment, is now being sought

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/documents/proposals/030828-1.pdf

Please consider the project and research proposal carefully and think about ways

East Asian Research and Translation in Hong Kong

I am looking forward to your timely response.

Sincerely,

Hal Hill

mailto: hal.hill@anu.edu.au

H. W. Arndt Professor of Southeast Asian Economics Research School of Pacific and Asian Studies

The Australian National University

Hong Kong, 03/10/08

HKLNA-Project -- The beginning of a solution

Dear Dr. Hill,

Twelve years on the ground in East Asia has taught me that the world is not yet ready for a universally shared common language. In the simplest of terms there are too many people learning English to provide adequate training to non-native speakers and insufficient real demand to help them sustain what they have learned after having been trained. Moreover, there are too few people learning the languages of non-English speaking peoples to provide a sufficiently strong foundation for good cross-cultural communication and understanding. As a result the overall quality of the English language has suffered, East Asian languages have been neglected, and understanding between peoples of East Asia and the West has been impaired. The obvious solution to this problem is to remove the artificial demand for English language created by East Asian governments and the language's global proponents. Unfortunately, those who are in the best position to remove this excess demand and consequent poor quality oversupply are the least inclined to do so.

In order to start the ball rolling I have created the Hong Kong Language Needs Assessment Project.

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/index.html

Although dedicated almost entirely to Hong Kong, the project has important implications for the rest of East Asia, where I hope someday to move it forward under a different name. The purpose of the project is to assess the real use and need of the English language in Hong Kong and eventually other East Asian societies and thereby provide policy makers and individual citizens with the information they require to make proper choices with regard to English language training and learning. The first important stage of this project is research, and it is to this end that the following proposal was developed and money, or alternatively employment, is now being sought

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/documents/proposals/030828-1.pdf

Please consider the project and research proposal carefully and think about ways

East Asian Research and Translation in Hong Kong

I am looking forward to your timely response.

Sincerely,

Warwick J. McKibbin

mailto: Warwick. McKibbin@anu.edu.au

Divisional Convenor Research School of Pacific and Asian Studies The Australian National University

Hong Kong, 03/10/08

HKLNA-Project -- The beginning of a solution

Dear Dr. McKibbin,

Twelve years on the ground in East Asia has taught me that the world is not yet ready for a universally shared common language. In the simplest of terms there are too many people learning English to provide adequate training to non-native speakers and insufficient real demand to help them sustain what they have learned after having been trained. Moreover, there are too few people learning the languages of non-English speaking peoples to provide a sufficiently strong foundation for good cross-cultural communication and understanding. As a result the overall quality of the English language has suffered, East Asian languages have been neglected, and understanding between peoples of East Asia and the West has been impaired. The obvious solution to this problem is to remove the artificial demand for English language created by East Asian governments and the language's global proponents. Unfortunately, those who are in the best position to remove this excess demand and consequent poor quality oversupply are the least inclined to do so.

In order to start the ball rolling I have created the Hong Kong Language Needs Assessment Project.

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/index.html

Although dedicated almost entirely to Hong Kong, the project has important implications for the rest of East Asia, where I hope someday to move it forward under a different name. The purpose of the project is to assess the real use and need of the English language in Hong Kong and eventually other East Asian societies and thereby provide policy makers and individual citizens with the information they require to make proper choices with regard to English language training and learning. The first important stage of this project is research, and it is to this end that the following proposal was developed and money, or alternatively employment, is now being sought

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/documents/proposals/030828-1.pdf

Please consider the project and research proposal carefully and think about ways

East Asian Research and Translation in Hong Kong

I am looking forward to your timely response.

Sincerely,

Xin Meng

mailto: Xin.Meng@anu.edu.au

Senior Fellow, Division of Economics Research School of Pacific and Asian Studies

The Australian National University

Hong Kong, 03/10/08

HKLNA-Project -- The beginning of a solution

Dear Dr. Xin,

Twelve years on the ground in East Asia has taught me that the world is not yet ready for a universally shared common language. In the simplest of terms there are too many people learning English to provide adequate training to non-native speakers and insufficient real demand to help them sustain what they have learned after having been trained. Moreover, there are too few people learning the languages of non-English speaking peoples to provide a sufficiently strong foundation for good cross-cultural communication and understanding. As a result the overall quality of the English language has suffered, East Asian languages have been neglected, and understanding between peoples of East Asia and the West has been impaired. The obvious solution to this problem is to remove the artificial demand for English language created by East Asian governments and the language's global proponents. Unfortunately, those who are in the best position to remove this excess demand and consequent poor quality oversupply are the least inclined to do so.

In order to start the ball rolling I have created the Hong Kong Language Needs Assessment Project.

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/index.html

Although dedicated almost entirely to Hong Kong, the project has important implications for the rest of East Asia, where I hope someday to move it forward under a different name. The purpose of the project is to assess the real use and need of the English language in Hong Kong and eventually other East Asian societies and thereby provide policy makers and individual citizens with the information they require to make proper choices with regard to English language training and learning. The first important stage of this project is research, and it is to this end that the following proposal was developed and money, or alternatively employment, is now being sought

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/documents/proposals/030828-1.pdf

Please consider the project and research proposal carefully and think about ways

East Asian Research and Translation in Hong Kong

I am looking forward to your timely response.

Sincerely,

Peter Warr

mailto: Peter. Warr@anu.edu.au
Professor, Division of Economics
Research School of Pacific and Asian Studies

The Australian National University

Hong Kong, 03/10/08

HKLNA-Project -- The beginning of a solution

Dear Professor Warr,

Twelve years on the ground in East Asia has taught me that the world is not yet ready for a universally shared common language. In the simplest of terms there are too many people learning English to provide adequate training to non-native speakers and insufficient real demand to help them sustain what they have learned after having been trained. Moreover, there are too few people learning the languages of non-English speaking peoples to provide a sufficiently strong foundation for good cross-cultural communication and understanding. As a result the overall quality of the English language has suffered, East Asian languages have been neglected, and understanding between peoples of East Asia and the West has been impaired. The obvious solution to this problem is to remove the artificial demand for English language created by East Asian governments and the language's global proponents. Unfortunately, those who are in the best position to remove this excess demand and consequent poor quality oversupply are the least inclined to do so.

In order to start the ball rolling I have created the Hong Kong Language Needs Assessment Project.

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/index.html

Although dedicated almost entirely to Hong Kong, the project has important implications for the rest of East Asia, where I hope someday to move it forward under a different name. The purpose of the project is to assess the real use and need of the English language in Hong Kong and eventually other East Asian societies and thereby provide policy makers and individual citizens with the information they require to make proper choices with regard to English language training and learning. The first important stage of this project is research, and it is to this end that the following proposal was developed and money, or alternatively employment, is now being sought

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/documents/proposals/030828-1.pdf

Please consider the project and research proposal carefully and think about ways

East Asian Research and Translation in Hong Kong

I am looking forward to your timely response.

Sincerely,

Mei Wen

mailto: rosemei. wen@anu.edu.au

Research Fellow, Division of Economics Research School of Pacific and Asian Studies The Australian National University

Hong Kong, 03/10/08

HKLNA-Project -- The beginning of a solution

Dear Professor Mei,

Twelve years on the ground in East Asia has taught me that the world is not yet ready for a universally shared common language. In the simplest of terms there are too many people learning English to provide adequate training to non-native speakers and insufficient real demand to help them sustain what they have learned after having been trained. Moreover, there are too few people learning the languages of non-English speaking peoples to provide a sufficiently strong foundation for good cross-cultural communication and understanding. As a result the overall quality of the English language has suffered, East Asian languages have been neglected, and understanding between peoples of East Asia and the West has been impaired. The obvious solution to this problem is to remove the artificial demand for English language created by East Asian governments and the language's global proponents. Unfortunately, those who are in the best position to remove this excess demand and consequent poor quality oversupply are the least inclined to do so.

In order to start the ball rolling I have created the Hong Kong Language Needs Assessment Project.

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/index.html

Although dedicated almost entirely to Hong Kong, the project has important implications for the rest of East Asia, where I hope someday to move it forward under a different name. The purpose of the project is to assess the real use and need of the English language in Hong Kong and eventually other East Asian societies and thereby provide policy makers and individual citizens with the information they require to make proper choices with regard to English language training and learning. The first important stage of this project is research, and it is to this end that the following proposal was developed and money, or alternatively employment, is now being sought

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/documents/proposals/030828-1.pdf

Please consider the project and research proposal carefully and think about ways

East Asian Research and Translation in Hong Kong

I am looking forward to your timely response.

Sincerely,

Lee Jong Wha

mailto:jongwha@korea.ac.kr

Professor, Division of Economics Research School of Pacific and Asian Studies The Australian National University

Hong Kong, 03/10/08

HKLNA-Project -- The beginning of a solution

Dear Professor Lee,

Twelve years on the ground in East Asia has taught me that the world is not yet ready for a universally shared common language. In the simplest of terms there are too many people learning English to provide adequate training to non-native speakers and insufficient real demand to help them sustain what they have learned after having been trained. Moreover, there are too few people learning the languages of non-English speaking peoples to provide a sufficiently strong foundation for good cross-cultural communication and understanding. As a result the overall quality of the English language has suffered, East Asian languages have been neglected, and understanding between peoples of East Asia and the West has been impaired. The obvious solution to this problem is to remove the artificial demand for English language created by East Asian governments and the language's global proponents. Unfortunately, those who are in the best position to remove this excess demand and consequent poor quality oversupply are the least inclined to do so.

In order to start the ball rolling I have created the Hong Kong Language Needs Assessment Project.

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/index.html

Although dedicated almost entirely to Hong Kong, the project has important implications for the rest of East Asia, where I hope someday to move it forward under a different name. The purpose of the project is to assess the real use and need of the English language in Hong Kong and eventually other East Asian societies and thereby provide policy makers and individual citizens with the information they require to make proper choices with regard to English language training and learning. The first important stage of this project is research, and it is to this end that the following proposal was developed and money, or alternatively employment, is now being sought

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/documents/proposals/030828-1.pdf

Please consider the project and research proposal carefully and think about ways

East Asian Research and Translation in Hong Kong

I am looking forward to your timely response.

Sincerely,

Paul Keal

mailto: Paul. Keal@anu.edu.au
Research Fellow
Graduate Studies in International Affairs
The Australian National University

Hong Kong, 03/10/08

HKLNA-Project -- The beginning of a solution

Dear Professor Keal,

Twelve years on the ground in East Asia has taught me that the world is not yet ready for a universally shared common language. In the simplest of terms there are too many people learning English to provide adequate training to non-native speakers and insufficient real demand to help them sustain what they have learned after having been trained. Moreover, there are too few people learning the languages of non-English speaking peoples to provide a sufficiently strong foundation for good cross-cultural communication and understanding. As a result the overall quality of the English language has suffered, East Asian languages have been neglected, and understanding between peoples of East Asia and the West has been impaired. The obvious solution to this problem is to remove the artificial demand for English language created by East Asian governments and the language's global proponents. Unfortunately, those who are in the best position to remove this excess demand and consequent poor quality oversupply are the least inclined to do so.

In order to start the ball rolling I have created the Hong Kong Language Needs Assessment Project.

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/index.html

Although dedicated almost entirely to Hong Kong, the project has important implications for the rest of East Asia, where I hope someday to move it forward under a different name. The purpose of the project is to assess the real use and need of the English language in Hong Kong and eventually other East Asian societies and thereby provide policy makers and individual citizens with the information they require to make proper choices with regard to English language training and learning. The first important stage of this project is research, and it is to this end that the following proposal was developed and money, or alternatively employment, is now being sought

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/documents/proposals/030828-1.pdf

Please consider the project and research proposal carefully and think about ways

East Asian Research and Translation in Hong Kong

I am looking forward to your timely response.

Sincerely,

Katherine Morton

mailto: Katherine. Morton@anu.edu.au

Research Fellow
Graduate Studies in International Affairs
The Australian National University

Hong Kong, 03/10/08

HKLNA-Project -- The beginning of a solution

Dear Dr. Morton,

Twelve years on the ground in East Asia has taught me that the world is not yet ready for a universally shared common language. In the simplest of terms there are too many people learning English to provide adequate training to non-native speakers and insufficient real demand to help them sustain what they have learned after having been trained. Moreover, there are too few people learning the languages of non-English speaking peoples to provide a sufficiently strong foundation for good cross-cultural communication and understanding. As a result the overall quality of the English language has suffered, East Asian languages have been neglected, and understanding between peoples of East Asia and the West has been impaired. The obvious solution to this problem is to remove the artificial demand for English language created by East Asian governments and the language's global proponents. Unfortunately, those who are in the best position to remove this excess demand and consequent poor quality oversupply are the least inclined to do so.

In order to start the ball rolling I have created the Hong Kong Language Needs Assessment Project.

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/index.html

Although dedicated almost entirely to Hong Kong, the project has important implications for the rest of East Asia, where I hope someday to move it forward under a different name. The purpose of the project is to assess the real use and need of the English language in Hong Kong and eventually other East Asian societies and thereby provide policy makers and individual citizens with the information they require to make proper choices with regard to English language training and learning. The first important stage of this project is research, and it is to this end that the following proposal was developed and money, or alternatively employment, is now being sought

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/documents/proposals/030828-1.pdf

Please consider the project and research proposal carefully and think about ways

East Asian Research and Translation in Hong Kong

I am looking forward to your timely response.

Sincerely,

Heather Rae

mailto: Heather. Rae@anu.edu.au

Research Fellow
Graduate Studies in International Affairs
The Australian National University

Hong Kong, 03/10/08

HKLNA-Project -- The beginning of a solution

Dear Dr. Rae,

Twelve years on the ground in East Asia has taught me that the world is not yet ready for a universally shared common language. In the simplest of terms there are too many people learning English to provide adequate training to non-native speakers and insufficient real demand to help them sustain what they have learned after having been trained. Moreover, there are too few people learning the languages of non-English speaking peoples to provide a sufficiently strong foundation for good cross-cultural communication and understanding. As a result the overall quality of the English language has suffered, East Asian languages have been neglected, and understanding between peoples of East Asia and the West has been impaired. The obvious solution to this problem is to remove the artificial demand for English language created by East Asian governments and the language's global proponents. Unfortunately, those who are in the best position to remove this excess demand and consequent poor quality oversupply are the least inclined to do so.

In order to start the ball rolling I have created the Hong Kong Language Needs Assessment Project.

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/index.html

Although dedicated almost entirely to Hong Kong, the project has important implications for the rest of East Asia, where I hope someday to move it forward under a different name. The purpose of the project is to assess the real use and need of the English language in Hong Kong and eventually other East Asian societies and thereby provide policy makers and individual citizens with the information they require to make proper choices with regard to English language training and learning. The first important stage of this project is research, and it is to this end that the following proposal was developed and money, or alternatively employment, is now being sought

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/documents/proposals/030828-1.pdf

Please consider the project and research proposal carefully and think about ways

East Asian Research and Translation in Hong Kong

I am looking forward to your timely response.

Sincerely,

Chris Reus Smit

mailto: Christian.Reus-Smit@anu.edu.au

Senior Fellow

Graduate Studies in International Affairs

The Australian National University

Hong Kong, 03/10/08

HKLNA-Project -- The beginning of a solution

Dear Dr. Smit,

Twelve years on the ground in East Asia has taught me that the world is not yet ready for a universally shared common language. In the simplest of terms there are too many people learning English to provide adequate training to non-native speakers and insufficient real demand to help them sustain what they have learned after having been trained. Moreover, there are too few people learning the languages of non-English speaking peoples to provide a sufficiently strong foundation for good cross-cultural communication and understanding. As a result the overall quality of the English language has suffered, East Asian languages have been neglected, and understanding between peoples of East Asia and the West has been impaired. The obvious solution to this problem is to remove the artificial demand for English language created by East Asian governments and the language's global proponents. Unfortunately, those who are in the best position to remove this excess demand and consequent poor quality oversupply are the least inclined to do so.

In order to start the ball rolling I have created the Hong Kong Language Needs Assessment Project.

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/index.html

Although dedicated almost entirely to Hong Kong, the project has important implications for the rest of East Asia, where I hope someday to move it forward under a different name. The purpose of the project is to assess the real use and need of the English language in Hong Kong and eventually other East Asian societies and thereby provide policy makers and individual citizens with the information they require to make proper choices with regard to English language training and learning. The first important stage of this project is research, and it is to this end that the following proposal was developed and money, or alternatively employment, is now being sought

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/documents/proposals/030828-1.pdf

Please consider the project and research proposal carefully and think about ways

East Asian Research and Translation in Hong Kong

I am looking forward to your timely response.

Sincerely,

Leonard Seabrooke

mailto: leonard.seabrooke@anu.edu.au

Postdoctoral Fellow
Graduate Studies in International Affairs
The Australian National University

Hong Kong, 03/10/08

HKLNA-Project -- The beginning of a solution

Dear Dr. Seabrooke,

Twelve years on the ground in East Asia has taught me that the world is not yet ready for a universally shared common language. In the simplest of terms there are too many people learning English to provide adequate training to non-native speakers and insufficient real demand to help them sustain what they have learned after having been trained. Moreover, there are too few people learning the languages of non-English speaking peoples to provide a sufficiently strong foundation for good cross-cultural communication and understanding. As a result the overall quality of the English language has suffered, East Asian languages have been neglected, and understanding between peoples of East Asia and the West has been impaired. The obvious solution to this problem is to remove the artificial demand for English language created by East Asian governments and the language's global proponents. Unfortunately, those who are in the best position to remove this excess demand and consequent poor quality oversupply are the least inclined to do so.

In order to start the ball rolling I have created the Hong Kong Language Needs Assessment Project.

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/index.html

Although dedicated almost entirely to Hong Kong, the project has important implications for the rest of East Asia, where I hope someday to move it forward under a different name. The purpose of the project is to assess the real use and need of the English language in Hong Kong and eventually other East Asian societies and thereby provide policy makers and individual citizens with the information they require to make proper choices with regard to English language training and learning. The first important stage of this project is research, and it is to this end that the following proposal was developed and money, or alternatively employment, is now being sought

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/documents/proposals/030828-1.pdf

Please consider the project and research proposal carefully and think about ways

East Asian Research and Translation in Hong Kong

I am looking forward to your timely response.

Sincerely,

Amareswar Galla

mailto: a.galla@anu.edu.au

Director

Graduate Studies
in Sustainable Heritage Development

The Australian National University

Hong Kong, 03/10/08

HKLNA-Project -- The beginning of a solution

Dear Professor Galla,

Twelve years on the ground in East Asia has taught me that the world is not yet ready for a universally shared common language. In the simplest of terms there are too many people learning English to provide adequate training to non-native speakers and insufficient real demand to help them sustain what they have learned after having been trained. Moreover, there are too few people learning the languages of non-English speaking peoples to provide a sufficiently strong foundation for good cross-cultural communication and understanding. As a result the overall quality of the English language has suffered, East Asian languages have been neglected, and understanding between peoples of East Asia and the West has been impaired. The obvious solution to this problem is to remove the artificial demand for English language created by East Asian governments and the language's global proponents. Unfortunately, those who are in the best position to remove this excess demand and consequent poor quality oversupply are the least inclined to do so.

In order to start the ball rolling I have created the Hong Kong Language Needs Assessment Project.

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/index.html

Although dedicated almost entirely to Hong Kong, the project has important implications for the rest of East Asia, where I hope someday to move it forward under a different name. The purpose of the project is to assess the real use and need of the English language in Hong Kong and eventually other East Asian societies and thereby provide policy makers and individual citizens with the information they require to make proper choices with regard to English language training and learning. The first important stage of this project is research, and it is to this end that the following proposal was developed and money, or alternatively employment, is now being sought

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/documents/proposals/030828-1.pdf

East Asian Research and Translation in Hong Kong

Please consider the project and research proposal carefully and think about ways that you, your organization, or others whom you know, might best contribute to the HKLNA-Project's ultimate success.

I am looking forward to your timely response.

Sincerely,

Yu Ping

mailto:ping.yu@anu.edu.au Program Administrator Graduate Studies in Sustainable Heritage Development The Australian National University

Hong Kong, 03/10/08

HKLNA-Project -- The beginning of a solution

Dear Ms. Yu,

Twelve years on the ground in East Asia has taught me that the world is not yet ready for a universally shared common language. In the simplest of terms there are too many people learning English to provide adequate training to non-native speakers and insufficient real demand to help them sustain what they have learned after having been trained. Moreover, there are too few people learning the languages of non-English speaking peoples to provide a sufficiently strong foundation for good cross-cultural communication and understanding. As a result the overall quality of the English language has suffered, East Asian languages have been neglected, and understanding between peoples of East Asia and the West has been impaired. The obvious solution to this problem is to remove the artificial demand for English language created by East Asian governments and the language's global proponents. Unfortunately, those who are in the best position to remove this excess demand and consequent poor quality oversupply are the least inclined to do so.

In order to start the ball rolling I have created the Hong Kong Language Needs Assessment Project.

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/index.html

Although dedicated almost entirely to Hong Kong, the project has important implications for the rest of East Asia, where I hope someday to move it forward under a different name. The purpose of the project is to assess the real use and need of the English language in Hong Kong and eventually other East Asian societies and thereby provide policy makers and individual citizens with the information they require to make proper choices with regard to English language training and learning. The first important stage of this project is research, and it is to this end that the following proposal was developed and money, or alternatively employment, is now being sought

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/documents/proposals/030828-1.pdf

East Asian Research and Translation in Hong Kong

Please consider the project and research proposal carefully and think about ways that you, your organization, or others whom you know, might best contribute to the HKLNA-Project's ultimate success.

I am looking forward to your timely response.

Sincerely,

James J. Fox

mailto: james.fox@anu.edu.au

Director, Research School of Pacific and Asian Studies Graduate Studies in Sustainable Heritage Development The Australian National University

Hong Kong, 03/10/08

HKLNA-Project -- The beginning of a solution

Dear Professor Fox,

Twelve years on the ground in East Asia has taught me that the world is not yet ready for a universally shared common language. In the simplest of terms there are too many people learning English to provide adequate training to non-native speakers and insufficient real demand to help them sustain what they have learned after having been trained. Moreover, there are too few people learning the languages of non-English speaking peoples to provide a sufficiently strong foundation for good cross-cultural communication and understanding. As a result the overall quality of the English language has suffered, East Asian languages have been neglected, and understanding between peoples of East Asia and the West has been impaired. The obvious solution to this problem is to remove the artificial demand for English language created by East Asian governments and the language's global proponents. Unfortunately, those who are in the best position to remove this excess demand and consequent poor quality oversupply are the least inclined to do so.

In order to start the ball rolling I have created the Hong Kong Language Needs Assessment Project.

 $\underline{http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/index.html}$

Although dedicated almost entirely to Hong Kong, the project has important implications for the rest of East Asia, where I hope someday to move it forward under a different name. The purpose of the project is to assess the real use and need of the English language in Hong Kong and eventually other East Asian societies and thereby provide policy makers and individual citizens with the information they require to make proper choices with regard to English language training and learning. The first important stage of this project is research, and it is to this end that the following proposal was developed and money, or alternatively employment, is now being sought

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/documents/proposals/030828-1.pdf

East Asian Research and Translation in Hong Kong

Please consider the project and research proposal carefully and think about ways that you, your organization, or others whom you know, might best contribute to the HKLNA-Project's ultimate success.

I am looking forward to your timely response.

Sincerely,

Paul Pickering

mailto: Paul. Pickering@anu.edu.au

Queen Elizabeth II Fellow

Graduate Studies
in Sustainable Heritage Development

The Australian National University

Hong Kong, 03/10/08

HKLNA-Project -- The beginning of a solution

Dear Dr. Pickering,

Twelve years on the ground in East Asia has taught me that the world is not yet ready for a universally shared common language. In the simplest of terms there are too many people learning English to provide adequate training to non-native speakers and insufficient real demand to help them sustain what they have learned after having been trained. Moreover, there are too few people learning the languages of non-English speaking peoples to provide a sufficiently strong foundation for good cross-cultural communication and understanding. As a result the overall quality of the English language has suffered, East Asian languages have been neglected, and understanding between peoples of East Asia and the West has been impaired. The obvious solution to this problem is to remove the artificial demand for English language created by East Asian governments and the language's global proponents. Unfortunately, those who are in the best position to remove this excess demand and consequent poor quality oversupply are the least inclined to do so.

In order to start the ball rolling I have created the Hong Kong Language Needs Assessment Project.

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/index.html

Although dedicated almost entirely to Hong Kong, the project has important implications for the rest of East Asia, where I hope someday to move it forward under a different name. The purpose of the project is to assess the real use and need of the English language in Hong Kong and eventually other East Asian societies and thereby provide policy makers and individual citizens with the information they require to make proper choices with regard to English language training and learning. The first important stage of this project is research, and it is to this end that the following proposal was developed and money, or alternatively employment, is now being sought

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/documents/proposals/030828-1.pdf

East Asian Research and Translation in Hong Kong

Please consider the project and research proposal carefully and think about ways that you, your organization, or others whom you know, might best contribute to the HKLNA-Project's ultimate success.

I am looking forward to your timely response.

Sincerely,

Darrell Tyron

mailto: darrell.tryon@anu.edu.au

Fellow
Graduate Studies
in Sustainable Heritage Development
The Australian National University

Hong Kong, 03/10/08

HKLNA-Project -- The beginning of a solution

Dear Dr. Tyron,

Twelve years on the ground in East Asia has taught me that the world is not yet ready for a universally shared common language. In the simplest of terms there are too many people learning English to provide adequate training to non-native speakers and insufficient real demand to help them sustain what they have learned after having been trained. Moreover, there are too few people learning the languages of non-English speaking peoples to provide a sufficiently strong foundation for good cross-cultural communication and understanding. As a result the overall quality of the English language has suffered, East Asian languages have been neglected, and understanding between peoples of East Asia and the West has been impaired. The obvious solution to this problem is to remove the artificial demand for English language created by East Asian governments and the language's global proponents. Unfortunately, those who are in the best position to remove this excess demand and consequent poor quality oversupply are the least inclined to do so.

In order to start the ball rolling I have created the Hong Kong Language Needs Assessment Project.

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/index.html

Although dedicated almost entirely to Hong Kong, the project has important implications for the rest of East Asia, where I hope someday to move it forward under a different name. The purpose of the project is to assess the real use and need of the English language in Hong Kong and eventually other East Asian societies and thereby provide policy makers and individual citizens with the information they require to make proper choices with regard to English language training and learning. The first important stage of this project is research, and it is to this end that the following proposal was developed and money, or alternatively employment, is now being sought

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/documents/proposals/030828-1.pdf

East Asian Research and Translation in Hong Kong

Please consider the project and research proposal carefully and think about ways that you, your organization, or others whom you know, might best contribute to the HKLNA-Project's ultimate success.

I am looking forward to your timely response.

Sincerely,

Judith Pabian

mailto: rspasgrants@coombs.anu.edu.au

Grants Officer

Research School of Pacific and Asian Studies

The Australian National University

Hong Kong, 03/10/08

HKLNA-Project -- The beginning of a solution

Dear Ms. Pabian,

Twelve years on the ground in East Asia has taught me that the world is not yet ready for a universally shared common language. In the simplest of terms there are too many people learning English to provide adequate training to non-native speakers and insufficient real demand to help them sustain what they have learned after having been trained. Moreover, there are too few people learning the languages of non-English speaking peoples to provide a sufficiently strong foundation for good cross-cultural communication and understanding. As a result the overall quality of the English language has suffered, East Asian languages have been neglected, and understanding between peoples of East Asia and the West has been impaired. The obvious solution to this problem is to remove the artificial demand for English language created by East Asian governments and the language's global proponents. Unfortunately, those who are in the best position to remove this excess demand and consequent poor quality oversupply are the least inclined to do so.

In order to start the ball rolling I have created the Hong Kong Language Needs Assessment Project.

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/index.html

Although dedicated almost entirely to Hong Kong, the project has important implications for the rest of East Asia, where I hope someday to move it forward under a different name. The purpose of the project is to assess the real use and need of the English language in Hong Kong and eventually other East Asian societies and thereby provide policy makers and individual citizens with the information they require to make proper choices with regard to English language training and learning. The first important stage of this project is research, and it is to this end that the following proposal was developed and money, or alternatively employment, is now being sought

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/documents/proposals/030828-1.pdf

Please consider the project and research proposal carefully and think about ways

East Asian Research and Translation in Hong Kong

I am looking forward to your timely response.

Sincerely,

Heather Booth

mailto: heather.booth@anu.edu.au

Senior Lecturer

Research School of Social Sciences

The Australian National University

Hong Kong, 03/10/08

HKLNA-Project -- The beginning of a solution

Dear Dr. Booth,

Twelve years on the ground in East Asia has taught me that the world is not yet ready for a universally shared common language. In the simplest of terms there are too many people learning English to provide adequate training to non-native speakers and insufficient real demand to help them sustain what they have learned after having been trained. Moreover, there are too few people learning the languages of non-English speaking peoples to provide a sufficiently strong foundation for good cross-cultural communication and understanding. As a result the overall quality of the English language has suffered, East Asian languages have been neglected, and understanding between peoples of East Asia and the West has been impaired. The obvious solution to this problem is to remove the artificial demand for English language created by East Asian governments and the language's global proponents. Unfortunately, those who are in the best position to remove this excess demand and consequent poor quality oversupply are the least inclined to do so.

In order to start the ball rolling I have created the Hong Kong Language Needs Assessment Project.

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/index.html

Although dedicated almost entirely to Hong Kong, the project has important implications for the rest of East Asia, where I hope someday to move it forward under a different name. The purpose of the project is to assess the real use and need of the English language in Hong Kong and eventually other East Asian societies and thereby provide policy makers and individual citizens with the information they require to make proper choices with regard to English language training and learning. The first important stage of this project is research, and it is to this end that the following proposal was developed and money, or alternatively employment, is now being sought

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/documents/proposals/030828-1.pdf

Please consider the project and research proposal carefully and think about ways

East Asian Research and Translation in Hong Kong

I am looking forward to your timely response.

Sincerely,

Peter McDonald

mailto: peter.mcdonald@anu.edu.au

Program Head, Demography and Sociology Research School of Social Sciences

The Australian National University

Hong Kong, 03/10/08

HKLNA-Project -- The beginning of a solution

Dear Professor McDonald,

Twelve years on the ground in East Asia has taught me that the world is not yet ready for a universally shared common language. In the simplest of terms there are too many people learning English to provide adequate training to non-native speakers and insufficient real demand to help them sustain what they have learned after having been trained. Moreover, there are too few people learning the languages of non-English speaking peoples to provide a sufficiently strong foundation for good cross-cultural communication and understanding. As a result the overall quality of the English language has suffered, East Asian languages have been neglected, and understanding between peoples of East Asia and the West has been impaired. The obvious solution to this problem is to remove the artificial demand for English language created by East Asian governments and the language's global proponents. Unfortunately, those who are in the best position to remove this excess demand and consequent poor quality oversupply are the least inclined to do so.

In order to start the ball rolling I have created the Hong Kong Language Needs Assessment Project.

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/index.html

Although dedicated almost entirely to Hong Kong, the project has important implications for the rest of East Asia, where I hope someday to move it forward under a different name. The purpose of the project is to assess the real use and need of the English language in Hong Kong and eventually other East Asian societies and thereby provide policy makers and individual citizens with the information they require to make proper choices with regard to English language training and learning. The first important stage of this project is research, and it is to this end that the following proposal was developed and money, or alternatively employment, is now being sought

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/documents/proposals/030828-1.pdf

Please consider the project and research proposal carefully and think about ways

East Asian Research and Translation in Hong Kong

I am looking forward to your timely response.

Sincerely,

Terence Hull

mailto: terry.hull@anu.edu.au

Research School of Social Sciences

The Australian National University

Hong Kong, 03/10/08

HKLNA-Project -- The beginning of a solution

Dear Professor Hull,

Twelve years on the ground in East Asia has taught me that the world is not yet ready for a universally shared common language. In the simplest of terms there are too many people learning English to provide adequate training to non-native speakers and insufficient real demand to help them sustain what they have learned after having been trained. Moreover, there are too few people learning the languages of non-English speaking peoples to provide a sufficiently strong foundation for good cross-cultural communication and understanding. As a result the overall quality of the English language has suffered, East Asian languages have been neglected, and understanding between peoples of East Asia and the West has been impaired. The obvious solution to this problem is to remove the artificial demand for English language created by East Asian governments and the language's global proponents. Unfortunately, those who are in the best position to remove this excess demand and consequent poor quality oversupply are the least inclined to do so.

In order to start the ball rolling I have created the Hong Kong Language Needs Assessment Project.

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/index.html

Although dedicated almost entirely to Hong Kong, the project has important implications for the rest of East Asia, where I hope someday to move it forward under a different name. The purpose of the project is to assess the real use and need of the English language in Hong Kong and eventually other East Asian societies and thereby provide policy makers and individual citizens with the information they require to make proper choices with regard to English language training and learning. The first important stage of this project is research, and it is to this end that the following proposal was developed and money, or alternatively employment, is now being sought

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/documents/proposals/030828-1.pdf

Please consider the project and research proposal carefully and think about ways that you, your organization, or others whom you know, might best contribute to the

East Asian Research and Translation in Hong Kong

HKLNA-Project's ultimate success.

I am looking forward to your timely response.

Sincerely,

Siew Ean Khoo

mailto:siewean.khoo@anu.edu.au

Executive Director, Australian Centre for Population F Research School of Social Sciences

The Australian National University

Hong Kong, 03/10/08

Hong Kong

HKLNA-Project -- The beginning of a solution

Dear Dr. Khoo,

Twelve years on the ground in East Asia has taught me that the world is not yet ready for a universally shared common language. In the simplest of terms there are too many people learning English to provide adequate training to non-native speakers and insufficient real demand to help them sustain what they have learned after having been trained. Moreover, there are too few people learning the languages of non-English speaking peoples to provide a sufficiently strong foundation for good cross-cultural communication and understanding. As a result the overall quality of the English language has suffered, East Asian languages have been neglected, and understanding between peoples of East Asia and the West has been impaired. The obvious solution to this problem is to remove the artificial demand for English language created by East Asian governments and the language's global proponents. Unfortunately, those who are in the best position to remove this excess demand and consequent poor quality oversupply are the least inclined to do so.

In order to start the ball rolling I have created the Hong Kong Language Needs Assessment Project.

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/index.html

Although dedicated almost entirely to Hong Kong, the project has important implications for the rest of East Asia, where I hope someday to move it forward under a different name. The purpose of the project is to assess the real use and need of the English language in Hong Kong and eventually other East Asian societies and thereby provide policy makers and individual citizens with the information they require to make proper choices with regard to English language training and learning. The first important stage of this project is research, and it is to this end that the following proposal was developed and money, or alternatively employment, is now being sought

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/documents/proposals/030828-1.pdf

Please consider the project and research proposal carefully and think about ways

East Asian Research and Translation in Hong Kong

I am looking forward to your timely response.

Sincerely,

Yohannes Kinfu Ashagrea

mailto: yohannes.kinfu@anu.edu.au
Research Fellow
Research School of Social Sciences
The Australian National University

Hong Kong, 03/10/08

HKLNA-Project -- The beginning of a solution

Dear Dr. Ashagrea,

Twelve years on the ground in East Asia has taught me that the world is not yet ready for a universally shared common language. In the simplest of terms there are too many people learning English to provide adequate training to non-native speakers and insufficient real demand to help them sustain what they have learned after having been trained. Moreover, there are too few people learning the languages of non-English speaking peoples to provide a sufficiently strong foundation for good cross-cultural communication and understanding. As a result the overall quality of the English language has suffered, East Asian languages have been neglected, and understanding between peoples of East Asia and the West has been impaired. The obvious solution to this problem is to remove the artificial demand for English language created by East Asian governments and the language's global proponents. Unfortunately, those who are in the best position to remove this excess demand and consequent poor quality oversupply are the least inclined to do so.

In order to start the ball rolling I have created the Hong Kong Language Needs Assessment Project.

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/index.html

Although dedicated almost entirely to Hong Kong, the project has important implications for the rest of East Asia, where I hope someday to move it forward under a different name. The purpose of the project is to assess the real use and need of the English language in Hong Kong and eventually other East Asian societies and thereby provide policy makers and individual citizens with the information they require to make proper choices with regard to English language training and learning. The first important stage of this project is research, and it is to this end that the following proposal was developed and money, or alternatively employment, is now being sought

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/documents/proposals/030828-1.pdf

Please consider the project and research proposal carefully and think about ways

East Asian Research and Translation in Hong Kong

I am looking forward to your timely response.

Sincerely,

David Lucas

mailto: david.lucas@anu.edu.au

Fellow

Research School of Social Sciences

The Australian National University

Hong Kong, 03/10/08

HKLNA-Project -- The beginning of a solution

Dear Dr. Lucas,

Twelve years on the ground in East Asia has taught me that the world is not yet ready for a universally shared common language. In the simplest of terms there are too many people learning English to provide adequate training to non-native speakers and insufficient real demand to help them sustain what they have learned after having been trained. Moreover, there are too few people learning the languages of non-English speaking peoples to provide a sufficiently strong foundation for good cross-cultural communication and understanding. As a result the overall quality of the English language has suffered, East Asian languages have been neglected, and understanding between peoples of East Asia and the West has been impaired. The obvious solution to this problem is to remove the artificial demand for English language created by East Asian governments and the language's global proponents. Unfortunately, those who are in the best position to remove this excess demand and consequent poor quality oversupply are the least inclined to do so.

In order to start the ball rolling I have created the Hong Kong Language Needs Assessment Project.

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/index.html

Although dedicated almost entirely to Hong Kong, the project has important implications for the rest of East Asia, where I hope someday to move it forward under a different name. The purpose of the project is to assess the real use and need of the English language in Hong Kong and eventually other East Asian societies and thereby provide policy makers and individual citizens with the information they require to make proper choices with regard to English language training and learning. The first important stage of this project is research, and it is to this end that the following proposal was developed and money, or alternatively employment, is now being sought

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/documents/proposals/030828-1.pdf

Please consider the project and research proposal carefully and think about ways

East Asian Research and Translation in Hong Kong

I am looking forward to your timely response.

Sincerely,

Carmen Voigt-Graf

mailto: carmen.voigt-graf@anu.edu.au

Postdoctoral Fellow Research School of Social Sciences

The Australian National University

Hong Kong, 03/10/08

HKLNA-Project -- The beginning of a solution

Dear Dr. Voigt,

Twelve years on the ground in East Asia has taught me that the world is not yet ready for a universally shared common language. In the simplest of terms there are too many people learning English to provide adequate training to non-native speakers and insufficient real demand to help them sustain what they have learned after having been trained. Moreover, there are too few people learning the languages of non-English speaking peoples to provide a sufficiently strong foundation for good cross-cultural communication and understanding. As a result the overall quality of the English language has suffered, East Asian languages have been neglected, and understanding between peoples of East Asia and the West has been impaired. The obvious solution to this problem is to remove the artificial demand for English language created by East Asian governments and the language's global proponents. Unfortunately, those who are in the best position to remove this excess demand and consequent poor quality oversupply are the least inclined to do so.

In order to start the ball rolling I have created the Hong Kong Language Needs Assessment Project.

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/index.html

Although dedicated almost entirely to Hong Kong, the project has important implications for the rest of East Asia, where I hope someday to move it forward under a different name. The purpose of the project is to assess the real use and need of the English language in Hong Kong and eventually other East Asian societies and thereby provide policy makers and individual citizens with the information they require to make proper choices with regard to English language training and learning. The first important stage of this project is research, and it is to this end that the following proposal was developed and money, or alternatively employment, is now being sought

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/documents/proposals/030828-1.pdf

Please consider the project and research proposal carefully and think about ways

East Asian Research and Translation in Hong Kong

I am looking forward to your timely response.

Sincerely,

