Deirdre Chetham

mailto: dchetham@fas.harvard.edu
Executive Director
Harvard University Asia Center

Hong Kong, 03/09/24 HKLNA-Project -- The beginning of a solution

Dear Mr. Chetham,

Twelve years on the ground in East Asia has taught me that the world is not yet ready for a universally shared common language. In the simplest of terms there are too many people learning English to provide adequate training to non-native speakers and insufficient real demand to help them sustain what they have learned after having been trained. Moreover, there are too few people learning the languages of non-English speaking peoples to provide a sufficiently strong foundation for good cross-cultural communication and understanding. As a result the overall quality of the English language has suffered, East Asian languages have been neglected, and understanding between peoples of East Asia and the West has been impaired. The obvious solution to this problem is to remove the artificial demand for English language created by East Asian governments and the language's global proponents. Unfortunately, those who are in the best position to remove this excess demand and consequent poor quality oversupply are the least inclined to do so.

In order to start the ball rolling I have created the Hong Kong Language Needs Assessment Project.

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/index.html

Although dedicated almost entirely to Hong Kong, the project has important implications for the rest of East Asia, where I hope someday to move it forward under a different name. The purpose of the project is to assess the real use and need of the English language in Hong Kong and eventually other East Asian societies and thereby provide policy makers and individual citizens with the information they require to make proper choices with regard to English language training and learning. The first important stage of this project is research, and it is to this end that the following proposal was developed and money, or alternatively employment, is now being sought

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/documents/proposals/030828-1.pdf

Please consider the project and research proposal carefully and think about ways

East Asian Research and Translation in Hong Kong

I am looking forward to your timely response.

Sincerely,

John Ziemer

mailto: ceaspubs@fas.harvard.edu

Executive Editor

Harvard University Asia Center

Hong Kong, 03/09/24 HKLNA-Project -- The beginning of a solution

Dear Mr. Ziemer,

Twelve years on the ground in East Asia has taught me that the world is not yet ready for a universally shared common language. In the simplest of terms there are too many people learning English to provide adequate training to non-native speakers and insufficient real demand to help them sustain what they have learned after having been trained. Moreover, there are too few people learning the languages of non-English speaking peoples to provide a sufficiently strong foundation for good cross-cultural communication and understanding. As a result the overall quality of the English language has suffered, East Asian languages have been neglected, and understanding between peoples of East Asia and the West has been impaired. The obvious solution to this problem is to remove the artificial demand for English language created by East Asian governments and the language's global proponents. Unfortunately, those who are in the best position to remove this excess demand and consequent poor quality oversupply are the least inclined to do so.

In order to start the ball rolling I have created the Hong Kong Language Needs Assessment Project.

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/index.html

Although dedicated almost entirely to Hong Kong, the project has important implications for the rest of East Asia, where I hope someday to move it forward under a different name. The purpose of the project is to assess the real use and need of the English language in Hong Kong and eventually other East Asian societies and thereby provide policy makers and individual citizens with the information they require to make proper choices with regard to English language training and learning. The first important stage of this project is research, and it is to this end that the following proposal was developed and money, or alternatively employment, is now being sought

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/documents/proposals/030828-1.pdf

Please consider the project and research proposal carefully and think about ways

East Asian Research and Translation in Hong Kong

I am looking forward to your timely response.

Sincerely,

Holly Angell

mailto: vhangell@fas.harvard.edu Program Administrator
Harvard University Asia Center

Hong Kong, 03/09/24 HKLNA-Project -- The beginning of a solution

Dear Ms. Angell,

Twelve years on the ground in East Asia has taught me that the world is not yet ready for a universally shared common language. In the simplest of terms there are too many people learning English to provide adequate training to non-native speakers and insufficient real demand to help them sustain what they have learned after having been trained. Moreover, there are too few people learning the languages of non-English speaking peoples to provide a sufficiently strong foundation for good cross-cultural communication and understanding. As a result the overall quality of the English language has suffered, East Asian languages have been neglected, and understanding between peoples of East Asia and the West has been impaired. The obvious solution to this problem is to remove the artificial demand for English language created by East Asian governments and the language's global proponents. Unfortunately, those who are in the best position to remove this excess demand and consequent poor quality oversupply are the least inclined to do so.

In order to start the ball rolling I have created the Hong Kong Language Needs Assessment Project.

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/index.html

Although dedicated almost entirely to Hong Kong, the project has important implications for the rest of East Asia, where I hope someday to move it forward under a different name. The purpose of the project is to assess the real use and need of the English language in Hong Kong and eventually other East Asian societies and thereby provide policy makers and individual citizens with the information they require to make proper choices with regard to English language training and learning. The first important stage of this project is research, and it is to this end that the following proposal was developed and money, or alternatively employment, is now being sought

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/documents/proposals/030828-1.pdf

Please consider the project and research proposal carefully and think about ways

East Asian Research and Translation in Hong Kong

I am looking forward to your timely response.

Sincerely,

Perri Chinalai

mailto: chinalai@fas.harvard.edu
Program Coordinator
Harvard University Asia Center

Hong Kong, 03/09/24 HKLNA-Project -- The beginning of a solution

Dear Mr. Chinalai,

Twelve years on the ground in East Asia has taught me that the world is not yet ready for a universally shared common language. In the simplest of terms there are too many people learning English to provide adequate training to non-native speakers and insufficient real demand to help them sustain what they have learned after having been trained. Moreover, there are too few people learning the languages of non-English speaking peoples to provide a sufficiently strong foundation for good cross-cultural communication and understanding. As a result the overall quality of the English language has suffered, East Asian languages have been neglected, and understanding between peoples of East Asia and the West has been impaired. The obvious solution to this problem is to remove the artificial demand for English language created by East Asian governments and the language's global proponents. Unfortunately, those who are in the best position to remove this excess demand and consequent poor quality oversupply are the least inclined to do so.

In order to start the ball rolling I have created the Hong Kong Language Needs Assessment Project.

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/index.html

Although dedicated almost entirely to Hong Kong, the project has important implications for the rest of East Asia, where I hope someday to move it forward under a different name. The purpose of the project is to assess the real use and need of the English language in Hong Kong and eventually other East Asian societies and thereby provide policy makers and individual citizens with the information they require to make proper choices with regard to English language training and learning. The first important stage of this project is research, and it is to this end that the following proposal was developed and money, or alternatively employment, is now being sought

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/documents/proposals/030828-1.pdf

Please consider the project and research proposal carefully and think about ways

East Asian Research and Translation in Hong Kong

I am looking forward to your timely response.

Sincerely,

Jorge Espada

mailto: jespada@fas.harvard.edu
Program Coordinator
Harvard University Asia Center

Hong Kong, 03/09/24 HKLNA-Project -- The beginning of a solution

Dear Mr. Espada,

Twelve years on the ground in East Asia has taught me that the world is not yet ready for a universally shared common language. In the simplest of terms there are too many people learning English to provide adequate training to non-native speakers and insufficient real demand to help them sustain what they have learned after having been trained. Moreover, there are too few people learning the languages of non-English speaking peoples to provide a sufficiently strong foundation for good cross-cultural communication and understanding. As a result the overall quality of the English language has suffered, East Asian languages have been neglected, and understanding between peoples of East Asia and the West has been impaired. The obvious solution to this problem is to remove the artificial demand for English language created by East Asian governments and the language's global proponents. Unfortunately, those who are in the best position to remove this excess demand and consequent poor quality oversupply are the least inclined to do so.

In order to start the ball rolling I have created the Hong Kong Language Needs Assessment Project.

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/index.html

Although dedicated almost entirely to Hong Kong, the project has important implications for the rest of East Asia, where I hope someday to move it forward under a different name. The purpose of the project is to assess the real use and need of the English language in Hong Kong and eventually other East Asian societies and thereby provide policy makers and individual citizens with the information they require to make proper choices with regard to English language training and learning. The first important stage of this project is research, and it is to this end that the following proposal was developed and money, or alternatively employment, is now being sought

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/documents/proposals/030828-1.pdf

Please consider the project and research proposal carefully and think about ways

East Asian Research and Translation in Hong Kong

I am looking forward to your timely response.

Sincerely,

Jon Mills

mailto: jdmills@fas.harvard.edu

Manager

Harvard University Asia Center

Hong Kong, 03/09/24 HKLNA-Project -- The beginning of a solution

Dear Mr. Mills,

Twelve years on the ground in East Asia has taught me that the world is not yet ready for a universally shared common language. In the simplest of terms there are too many people learning English to provide adequate training to non-native speakers and insufficient real demand to help them sustain what they have learned after having been trained. Moreover, there are too few people learning the languages of non-English speaking peoples to provide a sufficiently strong foundation for good cross-cultural communication and understanding. As a result the overall quality of the English language has suffered, East Asian languages have been neglected, and understanding between peoples of East Asia and the West has been impaired. The obvious solution to this problem is to remove the artificial demand for English language created by East Asian governments and the language's global proponents. Unfortunately, those who are in the best position to remove this excess demand and consequent poor quality oversupply are the least inclined to do so.

In order to start the ball rolling I have created the Hong Kong Language Needs Assessment Project.

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/index.html

Although dedicated almost entirely to Hong Kong, the project has important implications for the rest of East Asia, where I hope someday to move it forward under a different name. The purpose of the project is to assess the real use and need of the English language in Hong Kong and eventually other East Asian societies and thereby provide policy makers and individual citizens with the information they require to make proper choices with regard to English language training and learning. The first important stage of this project is research, and it is to this end that the following proposal was developed and money, or alternatively employment, is now being sought

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/documents/proposals/030828-1.pdf

Please consider the project and research proposal carefully and think about ways

East Asian Research and Translation in Hong Kong

I am looking forward to your timely response.

Sincerely,

Phyllis Swann

mailto: pswann@pd.state.gov Grants Specialist US Department of State

Hong Kong, 03/09/24 HKLNA-Project -- The beginning of a solution

Dear Ms. Swann,

Twelve years on the ground in East Asia has taught me that the world is not yet ready for a universally shared common language. In the simplest of terms there are too many people learning English to provide adequate training to non-native speakers and insufficient real demand to help them sustain what they have learned after having been trained. Moreover, there are too few people learning the languages of non-English speaking peoples to provide a sufficiently strong foundation for good cross-cultural communication and understanding. As a result the overall quality of the English language has suffered, East Asian languages have been neglected, and understanding between peoples of East Asia and the West has been impaired. The obvious solution to this problem is to remove the artificial demand for English language created by East Asian governments and the language's global proponents. Unfortunately, those who are in the best position to remove this excess demand and consequent poor quality oversupply are the least inclined to do so.

In order to start the ball rolling I have created the Hong Kong Language Needs Assessment Project.

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/index.html

Although dedicated almost entirely to Hong Kong, the project has important implications for the rest of East Asia, where I hope someday to move it forward under a different name. The purpose of the project is to assess the real use and need of the English language in Hong Kong and eventually other East Asian societies and thereby provide policy makers and individual citizens with the information they require to make proper choices with regard to English language training and learning. The first important stage of this project is research, and it is to this end that the following proposal was developed and money, or alternatively employment, is now being sought

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/documents/proposals/030828-1.pdf

Please consider the project and research proposal carefully and think about ways

East Asian Research and Translation in Hong Kong

I am looking forward to your timely response.

Sincerely,

Connie Stinson

mailto: cstinson@pd.state.gov
Senior Grants Specialist

US Department of State

Hong Kong, 03/09/24 HKLNA-Project -- The beginning of a solution

Dear Ms. Stinson,

Twelve years on the ground in East Asia has taught me that the world is not yet ready for a universally shared common language. In the simplest of terms there are too many people learning English to provide adequate training to non-native speakers and insufficient real demand to help them sustain what they have learned after having been trained. Moreover, there are too few people learning the languages of non-English speaking peoples to provide a sufficiently strong foundation for good cross-cultural communication and understanding. As a result the overall quality of the English language has suffered, East Asian languages have been neglected, and understanding between peoples of East Asia and the West has been impaired. The obvious solution to this problem is to remove the artificial demand for English language created by East Asian governments and the language's global proponents. Unfortunately, those who are in the best position to remove this excess demand and consequent poor quality oversupply are the least inclined to do so.

In order to start the ball rolling I have created the Hong Kong Language Needs Assessment Project.

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/index.html

Although dedicated almost entirely to Hong Kong, the project has important implications for the rest of East Asia, where I hope someday to move it forward under a different name. The purpose of the project is to assess the real use and need of the English language in Hong Kong and eventually other East Asian societies and thereby provide policy makers and individual citizens with the information they require to make proper choices with regard to English language training and learning. The first important stage of this project is research, and it is to this end that the following proposal was developed and money, or alternatively employment, is now being sought

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/documents/proposals/030828-1.pdf

Please consider the project and research proposal carefully and think about ways

East Asian Research and Translation in Hong Kong

I am looking forward to your timely response.

Sincerely,

Allison Doorbar

mailto: allison.doorbar@jwtworks.com

Managing Partner

JWT Education

Hong Kong, 03/09/24 HKLNA-Project -- The beginning of a solution

Dear Ms. Doorbar,

Twelve years on the ground in East Asia has taught me that the world is not yet ready for a universally shared common language. In the simplest of terms there are too many people learning English to provide adequate training to non-native speakers and insufficient real demand to help them sustain what they have learned after having been trained. Moreover, there are too few people learning the languages of non-English speaking peoples to provide a sufficiently strong foundation for good cross-cultural communication and understanding. As a result the overall quality of the English language has suffered, East Asian languages have been neglected, and understanding between peoples of East Asia and the West has been impaired. The obvious solution to this problem is to remove the artificial demand for English language created by East Asian governments and the language's global proponents. Unfortunately, those who are in the best position to remove this excess demand and consequent poor quality oversupply are the least inclined to do so.

In order to start the ball rolling I have created the Hong Kong Language Needs Assessment Project.

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/index.html

Although dedicated almost entirely to Hong Kong, the project has important implications for the rest of East Asia, where I hope someday to move it forward under a different name. The purpose of the project is to assess the real use and need of the English language in Hong Kong and eventually other East Asian societies and thereby provide policy makers and individual citizens with the information they require to make proper choices with regard to English language training and learning. The first important stage of this project is research, and it is to this end that the following proposal was developed and money, or alternatively employment, is now being sought

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/documents/proposals/030828-1.pdf

Please consider the project and research proposal carefully and think about ways

East Asian Research and Translation in Hong Kong

I am looking forward to your timely response.

Sincerely,

Koh Hey Kyung

mailto: hkoh@iie.org

Program Officer and Project Manager
Institute of International Education

Hong Kong, 03/09/24

HKLNA-Project -- The beginning of a solution

Dear Ms. Koh,

Twelve years on the ground in East Asia has taught me that the world is not yet ready for a universally shared common language. In the simplest of terms there are too many people learning English to provide adequate training to non-native speakers and insufficient real demand to help them sustain what they have learned after having been trained. Moreover, there are too few people learning the languages of non-English speaking peoples to provide a sufficiently strong foundation for good cross-cultural communication and understanding. As a result the overall quality of the English language has suffered, East Asian languages have been neglected, and understanding between peoples of East Asia and the West has been impaired. The obvious solution to this problem is to remove the artificial demand for English language created by East Asian governments and the language's global proponents. Unfortunately, those who are in the best position to remove this excess demand and consequent poor quality oversupply are the least inclined to do so.

In order to start the ball rolling I have created the Hong Kong Language Needs Assessment Project.

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/index.html

Although dedicated almost entirely to Hong Kong, the project has important implications for the rest of East Asia, where I hope someday to move it forward under a different name. The purpose of the project is to assess the real use and need of the English language in Hong Kong and eventually other East Asian societies and thereby provide policy makers and individual citizens with the information they require to make proper choices with regard to English language training and learning. The first important stage of this project is research, and it is to this end that the following proposal was developed and money, or alternatively employment, is now being sought

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/documents/proposals/030828-1.pdf

Please consider the project and research proposal carefully and think about ways

East Asian Research and Translation in Hong Kong

I am looking forward to your timely response.

Sincerely,

Todd M. Davis

mailto: tdavis@iie.org

Director

Institute of International Education

Hong Kong, 03/09/24 HKLNA-Project -- The beginning of a solution

Dear Mr. Davis,

Twelve years on the ground in East Asia has taught me that the world is not yet ready for a universally shared common language. In the simplest of terms there are too many people learning English to provide adequate training to non-native speakers and insufficient real demand to help them sustain what they have learned after having been trained. Moreover, there are too few people learning the languages of non-English speaking peoples to provide a sufficiently strong foundation for good cross-cultural communication and understanding. As a result the overall quality of the English language has suffered, East Asian languages have been neglected, and understanding between peoples of East Asia and the West has been impaired. The obvious solution to this problem is to remove the artificial demand for English language created by East Asian governments and the language's global proponents. Unfortunately, those who are in the best position to remove this excess demand and consequent poor quality oversupply are the least inclined to do so.

In order to start the ball rolling I have created the Hong Kong Language Needs Assessment Project.

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/index.html

Although dedicated almost entirely to Hong Kong, the project has important implications for the rest of East Asia, where I hope someday to move it forward under a different name. The purpose of the project is to assess the real use and need of the English language in Hong Kong and eventually other East Asian societies and thereby provide policy makers and individual citizens with the information they require to make proper choices with regard to English language training and learning. The first important stage of this project is research, and it is to this end that the following proposal was developed and money, or alternatively employment, is now being sought

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/documents/proposals/030828-1.pdf

Please consider the project and research proposal carefully and think about ways

East Asian Research and Translation in Hong Kong

I am looking forward to your timely response.

Sincerely,

Chalintorn Burian, Ph.D.

mailto: chalintorn@bkk.iie.org

Director

Institute of International Education

Hong Kong, 03/09/24

HKLNA-Project -- The beginning of a solution

Dear Dr. Burian,

Twelve years on the ground in East Asia has taught me that the world is not yet ready for a universally shared common language. In the simplest of terms there are too many people learning English to provide adequate training to non-native speakers and insufficient real demand to help them sustain what they have learned after having been trained. Moreover, there are too few people learning the languages of non-English speaking peoples to provide a sufficiently strong foundation for good cross-cultural communication and understanding. As a result the overall quality of the English language has suffered, East Asian languages have been neglected, and understanding between peoples of East Asia and the West has been impaired. The obvious solution to this problem is to remove the artificial demand for English language created by East Asian governments and the language's global proponents. Unfortunately, those who are in the best position to remove this excess demand and consequent poor quality oversupply are the least inclined to do so.

In order to start the ball rolling I have created the Hong Kong Language Needs Assessment Project.

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/index.html

Although dedicated almost entirely to Hong Kong, the project has important implications for the rest of East Asia, where I hope someday to move it forward under a different name. The purpose of the project is to assess the real use and need of the English language in Hong Kong and eventually other East Asian societies and thereby provide policy makers and individual citizens with the information they require to make proper choices with regard to English language training and learning. The first important stage of this project is research, and it is to this end that the following proposal was developed and money, or alternatively employment, is now being sought

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/documents/proposals/030828-1.pdf

Please consider the project and research proposal carefully and think about ways

East Asian Research and Translation in Hong Kong

I am looking forward to your timely response.

Sincerely,

Marina S. Ottaway

mailto: mottaway@ceip.org
Senior Associate

Carnegie Endowment for International Peace

Hong Kong, 03/09/24 HKLNA-Project -- The beginning of a solution

Dear Ms. Ottaway,

Twelve years on the ground in East Asia has taught me that the world is not yet ready for a universally shared common language. In the simplest of terms there are too many people learning English to provide adequate training to non-native speakers and insufficient real demand to help them sustain what they have learned after having been trained. Moreover, there are too few people learning the languages of non-English speaking peoples to provide a sufficiently strong foundation for good cross-cultural communication and understanding. As a result the overall quality of the English language has suffered, East Asian languages have been neglected, and understanding between peoples of East Asia and the West has been impaired. The obvious solution to this problem is to remove the artificial demand for English language created by East Asian governments and the language's global proponents. Unfortunately, those who are in the best position to remove this excess demand and consequent poor quality oversupply are the least inclined to do so.

In order to start the ball rolling I have created the Hong Kong Language Needs Assessment Project.

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/index.html

Although dedicated almost entirely to Hong Kong, the project has important implications for the rest of East Asia, where I hope someday to move it forward under a different name. The purpose of the project is to assess the real use and need of the English language in Hong Kong and eventually other East Asian societies and thereby provide policy makers and individual citizens with the information they require to make proper choices with regard to English language training and learning. The first important stage of this project is research, and it is to this end that the following proposal was developed and money, or alternatively employment, is now being sought

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/documents/proposals/030828-1.pdf

Please consider the project and research proposal carefully and think about ways

East Asian Research and Translation in Hong Kong

I am looking forward to your timely response.

Sincerely,

Daniel Brumberg

mailto: dbrumberg@ceip.org Visiting Scholar

Carnegie Endowment for International Peace

Hong Kong, 03/09/24 HKLNA-Project -- The beginning of a solution

Dear Mr. Brumberg,

Twelve years on the ground in East Asia has taught me that the world is not yet ready for a universally shared common language. In the simplest of terms there are too many people learning English to provide adequate training to non-native speakers and insufficient real demand to help them sustain what they have learned after having been trained. Moreover, there are too few people learning the languages of non-English speaking peoples to provide a sufficiently strong foundation for good cross-cultural communication and understanding. As a result the overall quality of the English language has suffered, East Asian languages have been neglected, and understanding between peoples of East Asia and the West has been impaired. The obvious solution to this problem is to remove the artificial demand for English language created by East Asian governments and the language's global proponents. Unfortunately, those who are in the best position to remove this excess demand and consequent poor quality oversupply are the least inclined to do so.

In order to start the ball rolling I have created the Hong Kong Language Needs Assessment Project.

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/index.html

Although dedicated almost entirely to Hong Kong, the project has important implications for the rest of East Asia, where I hope someday to move it forward under a different name. The purpose of the project is to assess the real use and need of the English language in Hong Kong and eventually other East Asian societies and thereby provide policy makers and individual citizens with the information they require to make proper choices with regard to English language training and learning. The first important stage of this project is research, and it is to this end that the following proposal was developed and money, or alternatively employment, is now being sought

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/documents/proposals/030828-1.pdf

Please consider the project and research proposal carefully and think about ways

East Asian Research and Translation in Hong Kong

I am looking forward to your timely response.

Sincerely,

Amy Hawthorne

mailto: ahawthorne@ceip.org

Associate

Carnegie Endowment for International Peace

Hong Kong, 03/09/24 HKLNA-Project -- The beginning of a solution

Dear Ms. Hawthorne,

Twelve years on the ground in East Asia has taught me that the world is not yet ready for a universally shared common language. In the simplest of terms there are too many people learning English to provide adequate training to non-native speakers and insufficient real demand to help them sustain what they have learned after having been trained. Moreover, there are too few people learning the languages of non-English speaking peoples to provide a sufficiently strong foundation for good cross-cultural communication and understanding. As a result the overall quality of the English language has suffered, East Asian languages have been neglected, and understanding between peoples of East Asia and the West has been impaired. The obvious solution to this problem is to remove the artificial demand for English language created by East Asian governments and the language's global proponents. Unfortunately, those who are in the best position to remove this excess demand and consequent poor quality oversupply are the least inclined to do so.

In order to start the ball rolling I have created the Hong Kong Language Needs Assessment Project.

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/index.html

Although dedicated almost entirely to Hong Kong, the project has important implications for the rest of East Asia, where I hope someday to move it forward under a different name. The purpose of the project is to assess the real use and need of the English language in Hong Kong and eventually other East Asian societies and thereby provide policy makers and individual citizens with the information they require to make proper choices with regard to English language training and learning. The first important stage of this project is research, and it is to this end that the following proposal was developed and money, or alternatively employment, is now being sought

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/documents/proposals/030828-1.pdf

Please consider the project and research proposal carefully and think about ways

East Asian Research and Translation in Hong Kong

I am looking forward to your timely response.

Sincerely,

Edward C. Chow

mailto: echow@ceip.org Visiting Fellow
Carnegie Endowment for International Peace

Hong Kong, 03/09/24 HKLNA-Project -- The beginning of a solution

Dear Mr. Chow,

Twelve years on the ground in East Asia has taught me that the world is not yet ready for a universally shared common language. In the simplest of terms there are too many people learning English to provide adequate training to non-native speakers and insufficient real demand to help them sustain what they have learned after having been trained. Moreover, there are too few people learning the languages of non-English speaking peoples to provide a sufficiently strong foundation for good cross-cultural communication and understanding. As a result the overall quality of the English language has suffered, East Asian languages have been neglected, and understanding between peoples of East Asia and the West has been impaired. The obvious solution to this problem is to remove the artificial demand for English language created by East Asian governments and the language's global proponents. Unfortunately, those who are in the best position to remove this excess demand and consequent poor quality oversupply are the least inclined to do so.

In order to start the ball rolling I have created the Hong Kong Language Needs Assessment Project.

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/index.html

Although dedicated almost entirely to Hong Kong, the project has important implications for the rest of East Asia, where I hope someday to move it forward under a different name. The purpose of the project is to assess the real use and need of the English language in Hong Kong and eventually other East Asian societies and thereby provide policy makers and individual citizens with the information they require to make proper choices with regard to English language training and learning. The first important stage of this project is research, and it is to this end that the following proposal was developed and money, or alternatively employment, is now being sought

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/documents/proposals/030828-1.pdf

Please consider the project and research proposal carefully and think about ways

East Asian Research and Translation in Hong Kong

I am looking forward to your timely response.

Sincerely,

James Gibney

mailto: jgibney@ceip.org
Executive Editor
Carnegie Endowment for International Peace

Hong Kong, 03/09/24 HKLNA-Project -- The beginning of a solution

Dear Mr. Gibney,

Twelve years on the ground in East Asia has taught me that the world is not yet ready for a universally shared common language. In the simplest of terms there are too many people learning English to provide adequate training to non-native speakers and insufficient real demand to help them sustain what they have learned after having been trained. Moreover, there are too few people learning the languages of non-English speaking peoples to provide a sufficiently strong foundation for good cross-cultural communication and understanding. As a result the overall quality of the English language has suffered, East Asian languages have been neglected, and understanding between peoples of East Asia and the West has been impaired. The obvious solution to this problem is to remove the artificial demand for English language created by East Asian governments and the language's global proponents. Unfortunately, those who are in the best position to remove this excess demand and consequent poor quality oversupply are the least inclined to do so.

In order to start the ball rolling I have created the Hong Kong Language Needs Assessment Project.

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/index.html

Although dedicated almost entirely to Hong Kong, the project has important implications for the rest of East Asia, where I hope someday to move it forward under a different name. The purpose of the project is to assess the real use and need of the English language in Hong Kong and eventually other East Asian societies and thereby provide policy makers and individual citizens with the information they require to make proper choices with regard to English language training and learning. The first important stage of this project is research, and it is to this end that the following proposal was developed and money, or alternatively employment, is now being sought

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/documents/proposals/030828-1.pdf

Please consider the project and research proposal carefully and think about ways

East Asian Research and Translation in Hong Kong

I am looking forward to your timely response.

Sincerely,

Veron Hung

mailto: vhung@ceip.org

Associate

Carnegie Endowment for International Peace

Hong Kong, 03/09/24 HKLNA-Project -- The beginning of a solution

Dear Ms. Hung,

Twelve years on the ground in East Asia has taught me that the world is not yet ready for a universally shared common language. In the simplest of terms there are too many people learning English to provide adequate training to non-native speakers and insufficient real demand to help them sustain what they have learned after having been trained. Moreover, there are too few people learning the languages of non-English speaking peoples to provide a sufficiently strong foundation for good cross-cultural communication and understanding. As a result the overall quality of the English language has suffered, East Asian languages have been neglected, and understanding between peoples of East Asia and the West has been impaired. The obvious solution to this problem is to remove the artificial demand for English language created by East Asian governments and the language's global proponents. Unfortunately, those who are in the best position to remove this excess demand and consequent poor quality oversupply are the least inclined to do so.

In order to start the ball rolling I have created the Hong Kong Language Needs Assessment Project.

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/index.html

Although dedicated almost entirely to Hong Kong, the project has important implications for the rest of East Asia, where I hope someday to move it forward under a different name. The purpose of the project is to assess the real use and need of the English language in Hong Kong and eventually other East Asian societies and thereby provide policy makers and individual citizens with the information they require to make proper choices with regard to English language training and learning. The first important stage of this project is research, and it is to this end that the following proposal was developed and money, or alternatively employment, is now being sought

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/documents/proposals/030828-1.pdf

Please consider the project and research proposal carefully and think about ways

East Asian Research and Translation in Hong Kong

I am looking forward to your timely response.

Sincerely,

Shanthi Kalathil

mailto: skalathil@ceip.org

Associate

Carnegie Endowment for International Peace

Hong Kong, 03/09/24 HKLNA-Project -- The beginning of a solution

Dear Ms. Kalathil,

Twelve years on the ground in East Asia has taught me that the world is not yet ready for a universally shared common language. In the simplest of terms there are too many people learning English to provide adequate training to non-native speakers and insufficient real demand to help them sustain what they have learned after having been trained. Moreover, there are too few people learning the languages of non-English speaking peoples to provide a sufficiently strong foundation for good cross-cultural communication and understanding. As a result the overall quality of the English language has suffered, East Asian languages have been neglected, and understanding between peoples of East Asia and the West has been impaired. The obvious solution to this problem is to remove the artificial demand for English language created by East Asian governments and the language's global proponents. Unfortunately, those who are in the best position to remove this excess demand and consequent poor quality oversupply are the least inclined to do so.

In order to start the ball rolling I have created the Hong Kong Language Needs Assessment Project.

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/index.html

Although dedicated almost entirely to Hong Kong, the project has important implications for the rest of East Asia, where I hope someday to move it forward under a different name. The purpose of the project is to assess the real use and need of the English language in Hong Kong and eventually other East Asian societies and thereby provide policy makers and individual citizens with the information they require to make proper choices with regard to English language training and learning. The first important stage of this project is research, and it is to this end that the following proposal was developed and money, or alternatively employment, is now being sought

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/documents/proposals/030828-1.pdf

Please consider the project and research proposal carefully and think about ways

East Asian Research and Translation in Hong Kong

I am looking forward to your timely response.

Sincerely,

Pei Min Xin

mailto: mpei@ceip.org

Senior Associate and Co-Director

Carnegie Endowment for International Peace

Hong Kong, 03/09/24 HKLNA-Project -- The beginning of a solution

Dear Ms. Pei,

Twelve years on the ground in East Asia has taught me that the world is not yet ready for a universally shared common language. In the simplest of terms there are too many people learning English to provide adequate training to non-native speakers and insufficient real demand to help them sustain what they have learned after having been trained. Moreover, there are too few people learning the languages of non-English speaking peoples to provide a sufficiently strong foundation for good cross-cultural communication and understanding. As a result the overall quality of the English language has suffered, East Asian languages have been neglected, and understanding between peoples of East Asia and the West has been impaired. The obvious solution to this problem is to remove the artificial demand for English language created by East Asian governments and the language's global proponents. Unfortunately, those who are in the best position to remove this excess demand and consequent poor quality oversupply are the least inclined to do so.

In order to start the ball rolling I have created the Hong Kong Language Needs Assessment Project.

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/index.html

Although dedicated almost entirely to Hong Kong, the project has important implications for the rest of East Asia, where I hope someday to move it forward under a different name. The purpose of the project is to assess the real use and need of the English language in Hong Kong and eventually other East Asian societies and thereby provide policy makers and individual citizens with the information they require to make proper choices with regard to English language training and learning. The first important stage of this project is research, and it is to this end that the following proposal was developed and money, or alternatively employment, is now being sought

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/documents/proposals/030828-1.pdf

Please consider the project and research proposal carefully and think about ways

East Asian Research and Translation in Hong Kong

I am looking forward to your timely response.

Sincerely,

George Perkovich

mailto:gperkovich@ceip.org
Vice President for Studies
Carnegie Endowment for International Peace

Hong Kong, 03/09/24 HKLNA-Project -- The beginning of a solution

Dear Mr. Perkovich,

Twelve years on the ground in East Asia has taught me that the world is not yet ready for a universally shared common language. In the simplest of terms there are too many people learning English to provide adequate training to non-native speakers and insufficient real demand to help them sustain what they have learned after having been trained. Moreover, there are too few people learning the languages of non-English speaking peoples to provide a sufficiently strong foundation for good cross-cultural communication and understanding. As a result the overall quality of the English language has suffered, East Asian languages have been neglected, and understanding between peoples of East Asia and the West has been impaired. The obvious solution to this problem is to remove the artificial demand for English language created by East Asian governments and the language's global proponents. Unfortunately, those who are in the best position to remove this excess demand and consequent poor quality oversupply are the least inclined to do so.

In order to start the ball rolling I have created the Hong Kong Language Needs Assessment Project.

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/index.html

Although dedicated almost entirely to Hong Kong, the project has important implications for the rest of East Asia, where I hope someday to move it forward under a different name. The purpose of the project is to assess the real use and need of the English language in Hong Kong and eventually other East Asian societies and thereby provide policy makers and individual citizens with the information they require to make proper choices with regard to English language training and learning. The first important stage of this project is research, and it is to this end that the following proposal was developed and money, or alternatively employment, is now being sought

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/documents/proposals/030828-1.pdf

Please consider the project and research proposal carefully and think about ways

East Asian Research and Translation in Hong Kong

I am looking forward to your timely response.

Sincerely,

Michael Swaine

mailto: mswaine@ceip.org

Senior Associate and Co-Director

Carnegie Endowment for International Peace

Hong Kong, 03/09/24 HKLNA-Project -- The beginning of a solution

Dear Mr. Swaine,

Twelve years on the ground in East Asia has taught me that the world is not yet ready for a universally shared common language. In the simplest of terms there are too many people learning English to provide adequate training to non-native speakers and insufficient real demand to help them sustain what they have learned after having been trained. Moreover, there are too few people learning the languages of non-English speaking peoples to provide a sufficiently strong foundation for good cross-cultural communication and understanding. As a result the overall quality of the English language has suffered, East Asian languages have been neglected, and understanding between peoples of East Asia and the West has been impaired. The obvious solution to this problem is to remove the artificial demand for English language created by East Asian governments and the language's global proponents. Unfortunately, those who are in the best position to remove this excess demand and consequent poor quality oversupply are the least inclined to do so.

In order to start the ball rolling I have created the Hong Kong Language Needs Assessment Project.

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/index.html

Although dedicated almost entirely to Hong Kong, the project has important implications for the rest of East Asia, where I hope someday to move it forward under a different name. The purpose of the project is to assess the real use and need of the English language in Hong Kong and eventually other East Asian societies and thereby provide policy makers and individual citizens with the information they require to make proper choices with regard to English language training and learning. The first important stage of this project is research, and it is to this end that the following proposal was developed and money, or alternatively employment, is now being sought

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/documents/proposals/030828-1.pdf

Please consider the project and research proposal carefully and think about ways

East Asian Research and Translation in Hong Kong

I am looking forward to your timely response.

Sincerely,

Jon Wolfsthal

mailto: jwolfsthal@ceip.org

Deputy Director and Associate

Carnegie Endowment for International Peace

Hong Kong, 03/09/24 HKLNA-Project -- The beginning of a solution

Dear Mr. Wolfsthal,

Twelve years on the ground in East Asia has taught me that the world is not yet ready for a universally shared common language. In the simplest of terms there are too many people learning English to provide adequate training to non-native speakers and insufficient real demand to help them sustain what they have learned after having been trained. Moreover, there are too few people learning the languages of non-English speaking peoples to provide a sufficiently strong foundation for good cross-cultural communication and understanding. As a result the overall quality of the English language has suffered, East Asian languages have been neglected, and understanding between peoples of East Asia and the West has been impaired. The obvious solution to this problem is to remove the artificial demand for English language created by East Asian governments and the language's global proponents. Unfortunately, those who are in the best position to remove this excess demand and consequent poor quality oversupply are the least inclined to do so.

In order to start the ball rolling I have created the Hong Kong Language Needs Assessment Project.

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/index.html

Although dedicated almost entirely to Hong Kong, the project has important implications for the rest of East Asia, where I hope someday to move it forward under a different name. The purpose of the project is to assess the real use and need of the English language in Hong Kong and eventually other East Asian societies and thereby provide policy makers and individual citizens with the information they require to make proper choices with regard to English language training and learning. The first important stage of this project is research, and it is to this end that the following proposal was developed and money, or alternatively employment, is now being sought

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/documents/proposals/030828-1.pdf

Please consider the project and research proposal carefully and think about ways

East Asian Research and Translation in Hong Kong

I am looking forward to your timely response.

Sincerely,

Jessica Tuchman Mathews

mailto: jmathews@ceip.org

President

Carnegie Endowment for International Peace

Hong Kong, 03/09/24 HKLNA-Project -- The beginning of a solution

Dear Ms. Mathews,

Twelve years on the ground in East Asia has taught me that the world is not yet ready for a universally shared common language. In the simplest of terms there are too many people learning English to provide adequate training to non-native speakers and insufficient real demand to help them sustain what they have learned after having been trained. Moreover, there are too few people learning the languages of non-English speaking peoples to provide a sufficiently strong foundation for good cross-cultural communication and understanding. As a result the overall quality of the English language has suffered, East Asian languages have been neglected, and understanding between peoples of East Asia and the West has been impaired. The obvious solution to this problem is to remove the artificial demand for English language created by East Asian governments and the language's global proponents. Unfortunately, those who are in the best position to remove this excess demand and consequent poor quality oversupply are the least inclined to do so.

In order to start the ball rolling I have created the Hong Kong Language Needs Assessment Project.

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/index.html

Although dedicated almost entirely to Hong Kong, the project has important implications for the rest of East Asia, where I hope someday to move it forward under a different name. The purpose of the project is to assess the real use and need of the English language in Hong Kong and eventually other East Asian societies and thereby provide policy makers and individual citizens with the information they require to make proper choices with regard to English language training and learning. The first important stage of this project is research, and it is to this end that the following proposal was developed and money, or alternatively employment, is now being sought

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/documents/proposals/030828-1.pdf

Please consider the project and research proposal carefully and think about ways

East Asian Research and Translation in Hong Kong

I am looking forward to your timely response.

Sincerely,

Robert Kagan

mailto: kagan@ceip.org Senior Associate

Carnegie Endowment for International Peace

Hong Kong, 03/09/24 HKLNA-Project -- The beginning of a solution

Dear Mr. Kagan,

Twelve years on the ground in East Asia has taught me that the world is not yet ready for a universally shared common language. In the simplest of terms there are too many people learning English to provide adequate training to non-native speakers and insufficient real demand to help them sustain what they have learned after having been trained. Moreover, there are too few people learning the languages of non-English speaking peoples to provide a sufficiently strong foundation for good cross-cultural communication and understanding. As a result the overall quality of the English language has suffered, East Asian languages have been neglected, and understanding between peoples of East Asia and the West has been impaired. The obvious solution to this problem is to remove the artificial demand for English language created by East Asian governments and the language's global proponents. Unfortunately, those who are in the best position to remove this excess demand and consequent poor quality oversupply are the least inclined to do so.

In order to start the ball rolling I have created the Hong Kong Language Needs Assessment Project.

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/index.html

Although dedicated almost entirely to Hong Kong, the project has important implications for the rest of East Asia, where I hope someday to move it forward under a different name. The purpose of the project is to assess the real use and need of the English language in Hong Kong and eventually other East Asian societies and thereby provide policy makers and individual citizens with the information they require to make proper choices with regard to English language training and learning. The first important stage of this project is research, and it is to this end that the following proposal was developed and money, or alternatively employment, is now being sought

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/documents/proposals/030828-1.pdf

Please consider the project and research proposal carefully and think about ways

East Asian Research and Translation in Hong Kong

I am looking forward to your timely response.

Sincerely,

Thomas Carothers

mailto: tcarothers@ceip.org

Senior Associate and Director

Carnegie Endowment for International Peace

Hong Kong, 03/09/24 HKLNA-Project -- The beginning of a solution

Dear Mr. Carothers,

Twelve years on the ground in East Asia has taught me that the world is not yet ready for a universally shared common language. In the simplest of terms there are too many people learning English to provide adequate training to non-native speakers and insufficient real demand to help them sustain what they have learned after having been trained. Moreover, there are too few people learning the languages of non-English speaking peoples to provide a sufficiently strong foundation for good cross-cultural communication and understanding. As a result the overall quality of the English language has suffered, East Asian languages have been neglected, and understanding between peoples of East Asia and the West has been impaired. The obvious solution to this problem is to remove the artificial demand for English language created by East Asian governments and the language's global proponents. Unfortunately, those who are in the best position to remove this excess demand and consequent poor quality oversupply are the least inclined to do so.

In order to start the ball rolling I have created the Hong Kong Language Needs Assessment Project.

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/index.html

Although dedicated almost entirely to Hong Kong, the project has important implications for the rest of East Asia, where I hope someday to move it forward under a different name. The purpose of the project is to assess the real use and need of the English language in Hong Kong and eventually other East Asian societies and thereby provide policy makers and individual citizens with the information they require to make proper choices with regard to English language training and learning. The first important stage of this project is research, and it is to this end that the following proposal was developed and money, or alternatively employment, is now being sought

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/documents/proposals/030828-1.pdf

Please consider the project and research proposal carefully and think about ways

East Asian Research and Translation in Hong Kong

I am looking forward to your timely response.

Sincerely,

Sandra Polaski

mailto: spolaski@ceip.org
Senior Associate

Carnegie Endowment for International Peace

Hong Kong, 03/09/24 HKLNA-Project -- The beginning of a solution

Dear Ms. Polaski,

Twelve years on the ground in East Asia has taught me that the world is not yet ready for a universally shared common language. In the simplest of terms there are too many people learning English to provide adequate training to non-native speakers and insufficient real demand to help them sustain what they have learned after having been trained. Moreover, there are too few people learning the languages of non-English speaking peoples to provide a sufficiently strong foundation for good cross-cultural communication and understanding. As a result the overall quality of the English language has suffered, East Asian languages have been neglected, and understanding between peoples of East Asia and the West has been impaired. The obvious solution to this problem is to remove the artificial demand for English language created by East Asian governments and the language's global proponents. Unfortunately, those who are in the best position to remove this excess demand and consequent poor quality oversupply are the least inclined to do so.

In order to start the ball rolling I have created the Hong Kong Language Needs Assessment Project.

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/index.html

Although dedicated almost entirely to Hong Kong, the project has important implications for the rest of East Asia, where I hope someday to move it forward under a different name. The purpose of the project is to assess the real use and need of the English language in Hong Kong and eventually other East Asian societies and thereby provide policy makers and individual citizens with the information they require to make proper choices with regard to English language training and learning. The first important stage of this project is research, and it is to this end that the following proposal was developed and money, or alternatively employment, is now being sought

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/documents/proposals/030828-1.pdf

Please consider the project and research proposal carefully and think about ways

East Asian Research and Translation in Hong Kong

I am looking forward to your timely response.

Sincerely,

Martha Brill Olcott

mailto: molcott@ceip.org
Senior Associate

Carnegie Endowment for International Peace

Hong Kong, 03/09/24 HKLNA-Project -- The beginning of a solution

Dear Ms. Olcott,

Twelve years on the ground in East Asia has taught me that the world is not yet ready for a universally shared common language. In the simplest of terms there are too many people learning English to provide adequate training to non-native speakers and insufficient real demand to help them sustain what they have learned after having been trained. Moreover, there are too few people learning the languages of non-English speaking peoples to provide a sufficiently strong foundation for good cross-cultural communication and understanding. As a result the overall quality of the English language has suffered, East Asian languages have been neglected, and understanding between peoples of East Asia and the West has been impaired. The obvious solution to this problem is to remove the artificial demand for English language created by East Asian governments and the language's global proponents. Unfortunately, those who are in the best position to remove this excess demand and consequent poor quality oversupply are the least inclined to do so.

In order to start the ball rolling I have created the Hong Kong Language Needs Assessment Project.

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/index.html

Although dedicated almost entirely to Hong Kong, the project has important implications for the rest of East Asia, where I hope someday to move it forward under a different name. The purpose of the project is to assess the real use and need of the English language in Hong Kong and eventually other East Asian societies and thereby provide policy makers and individual citizens with the information they require to make proper choices with regard to English language training and learning. The first important stage of this project is research, and it is to this end that the following proposal was developed and money, or alternatively employment, is now being sought

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/documents/proposals/030828-1.pdf

Please consider the project and research proposal carefully and think about ways

East Asian Research and Translation in Hong Kong

I am looking forward to your timely response.

Sincerely,

Moisés Naím

mailto: mnaim@ceip.org
Editor, Foreign Policy
Carnegie Endowment for International Peace

Hong Kong, 03/09/24 HKLNA-Project -- The beginning of a solution

Dear Mr. Naím,

Twelve years on the ground in East Asia has taught me that the world is not yet ready for a universally shared common language. In the simplest of terms there are too many people learning English to provide adequate training to non-native speakers and insufficient real demand to help them sustain what they have learned after having been trained. Moreover, there are too few people learning the languages of non-English speaking peoples to provide a sufficiently strong foundation for good cross-cultural communication and understanding. As a result the overall quality of the English language has suffered, East Asian languages have been neglected, and understanding between peoples of East Asia and the West has been impaired. The obvious solution to this problem is to remove the artificial demand for English language created by East Asian governments and the language's global proponents. Unfortunately, those who are in the best position to remove this excess demand and consequent poor quality oversupply are the least inclined to do so.

In order to start the ball rolling I have created the Hong Kong Language Needs Assessment Project.

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/index.html

Although dedicated almost entirely to Hong Kong, the project has important implications for the rest of East Asia, where I hope someday to move it forward under a different name. The purpose of the project is to assess the real use and need of the English language in Hong Kong and eventually other East Asian societies and thereby provide policy makers and individual citizens with the information they require to make proper choices with regard to English language training and learning. The first important stage of this project is research, and it is to this end that the following proposal was developed and money, or alternatively employment, is now being sought

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/documents/proposals/030828-1.pdf

Please consider the project and research proposal carefully and think about ways

East Asian Research and Translation in Hong Kong

I am looking forward to your timely response.

Sincerely,

David Rothkopf

mailto: drothkopf@ceip.org
Visiting Scholar
Carnegie Endowment for International Peace

Hong Kong, 03/09/24 HKLNA-Project -- The beginning of a solution

Dear Mr. Rothkopf,

Twelve years on the ground in East Asia has taught me that the world is not yet ready for a universally shared common language. In the simplest of terms there are too many people learning English to provide adequate training to non-native speakers and insufficient real demand to help them sustain what they have learned after having been trained. Moreover, there are too few people learning the languages of non-English speaking peoples to provide a sufficiently strong foundation for good cross-cultural communication and understanding. As a result the overall quality of the English language has suffered, East Asian languages have been neglected, and understanding between peoples of East Asia and the West has been impaired. The obvious solution to this problem is to remove the artificial demand for English language created by East Asian governments and the language's global proponents. Unfortunately, those who are in the best position to remove this excess demand and consequent poor quality oversupply are the least inclined to do so.

In order to start the ball rolling I have created the Hong Kong Language Needs Assessment Project.

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/index.html

Although dedicated almost entirely to Hong Kong, the project has important implications for the rest of East Asia, where I hope someday to move it forward under a different name. The purpose of the project is to assess the real use and need of the English language in Hong Kong and eventually other East Asian societies and thereby provide policy makers and individual citizens with the information they require to make proper choices with regard to English language training and learning. The first important stage of this project is research, and it is to this end that the following proposal was developed and money, or alternatively employment, is now being sought

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/documents/proposals/030828-1.pdf

Please consider the project and research proposal carefully and think about ways

East Asian Research and Translation in Hong Kong

I am looking forward to your timely response.

Sincerely,

Anatol Lieven

mailto:alieven@ceip.org Senior Associate

Carnegie Endowment for International Peace

Hong Kong, 03/09/24 HKLNA-Project -- The beginning of a solution

Dear Mr. Lieven,

Twelve years on the ground in East Asia has taught me that the world is not yet ready for a universally shared common language. In the simplest of terms there are too many people learning English to provide adequate training to non-native speakers and insufficient real demand to help them sustain what they have learned after having been trained. Moreover, there are too few people learning the languages of non-English speaking peoples to provide a sufficiently strong foundation for good cross-cultural communication and understanding. As a result the overall quality of the English language has suffered, East Asian languages have been neglected, and understanding between peoples of East Asia and the West has been impaired. The obvious solution to this problem is to remove the artificial demand for English language created by East Asian governments and the language's global proponents. Unfortunately, those who are in the best position to remove this excess demand and consequent poor quality oversupply are the least inclined to do so.

In order to start the ball rolling I have created the Hong Kong Language Needs Assessment Project.

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/index.html

Although dedicated almost entirely to Hong Kong, the project has important implications for the rest of East Asia, where I hope someday to move it forward under a different name. The purpose of the project is to assess the real use and need of the English language in Hong Kong and eventually other East Asian societies and thereby provide policy makers and individual citizens with the information they require to make proper choices with regard to English language training and learning. The first important stage of this project is research, and it is to this end that the following proposal was developed and money, or alternatively employment, is now being sought

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/documents/proposals/030828-1.pdf

Please consider the project and research proposal carefully and think about ways

East Asian Research and Translation in Hong Kong

I am looking forward to your timely response.

Sincerely,

Scott Vaughan

mailto: svaughan@ceip.org
Visiting Scholar
Carnegie Endowment for International Peace

Hong Kong, 03/09/24 HKLNA-Project -- The beginning of a solution

Dear Mr. Vaughan,

Twelve years on the ground in East Asia has taught me that the world is not yet ready for a universally shared common language. In the simplest of terms there are too many people learning English to provide adequate training to non-native speakers and insufficient real demand to help them sustain what they have learned after having been trained. Moreover, there are too few people learning the languages of non-English speaking peoples to provide a sufficiently strong foundation for good cross-cultural communication and understanding. As a result the overall quality of the English language has suffered, East Asian languages have been neglected, and understanding between peoples of East Asia and the West has been impaired. The obvious solution to this problem is to remove the artificial demand for English language created by East Asian governments and the language's global proponents. Unfortunately, those who are in the best position to remove this excess demand and consequent poor quality oversupply are the least inclined to do so.

In order to start the ball rolling I have created the Hong Kong Language Needs Assessment Project.

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/index.html

Although dedicated almost entirely to Hong Kong, the project has important implications for the rest of East Asia, where I hope someday to move it forward under a different name. The purpose of the project is to assess the real use and need of the English language in Hong Kong and eventually other East Asian societies and thereby provide policy makers and individual citizens with the information they require to make proper choices with regard to English language training and learning. The first important stage of this project is research, and it is to this end that the following proposal was developed and money, or alternatively employment, is now being sought

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/documents/proposals/030828-1.pdf

Please consider the project and research proposal carefully and think about ways

East Asian Research and Translation in Hong Kong

I am looking forward to your timely response.

Sincerely,

Carlos Lozada

mailto: clozada@ceip.org

Managing Editor, Foreign Policy

Carnegie Endowment for International Peace

Hong Kong, 03/09/24 HKLNA-Project -- The beginning of a solution

Dear Mr. Lozada,

Twelve years on the ground in East Asia has taught me that the world is not yet ready for a universally shared common language. In the simplest of terms there are too many people learning English to provide adequate training to non-native speakers and insufficient real demand to help them sustain what they have learned after having been trained. Moreover, there are too few people learning the languages of non-English speaking peoples to provide a sufficiently strong foundation for good cross-cultural communication and understanding. As a result the overall quality of the English language has suffered, East Asian languages have been neglected, and understanding between peoples of East Asia and the West has been impaired. The obvious solution to this problem is to remove the artificial demand for English language created by East Asian governments and the language's global proponents. Unfortunately, those who are in the best position to remove this excess demand and consequent poor quality oversupply are the least inclined to do so.

In order to start the ball rolling I have created the Hong Kong Language Needs Assessment Project.

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/index.html

Although dedicated almost entirely to Hong Kong, the project has important implications for the rest of East Asia, where I hope someday to move it forward under a different name. The purpose of the project is to assess the real use and need of the English language in Hong Kong and eventually other East Asian societies and thereby provide policy makers and individual citizens with the information they require to make proper choices with regard to English language training and learning. The first important stage of this project is research, and it is to this end that the following proposal was developed and money, or alternatively employment, is now being sought

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/documents/proposals/030828-1.pdf

Please consider the project and research proposal carefully and think about ways

East Asian Research and Translation in Hong Kong

I am looking forward to your timely response.

Sincerely,

Karen DeYoung

mailto: kdeyoung@ceip.org
Visiting Scholar
Carnegie Endowment for International Peace

Hong Kong, 03/09/24 HKLNA-Project -- The beginning of a solution

Dear Ms. DeYoung,

Twelve years on the ground in East Asia has taught me that the world is not yet ready for a universally shared common language. In the simplest of terms there are too many people learning English to provide adequate training to non-native speakers and insufficient real demand to help them sustain what they have learned after having been trained. Moreover, there are too few people learning the languages of non-English speaking peoples to provide a sufficiently strong foundation for good cross-cultural communication and understanding. As a result the overall quality of the English language has suffered, East Asian languages have been neglected, and understanding between peoples of East Asia and the West has been impaired. The obvious solution to this problem is to remove the artificial demand for English language created by East Asian governments and the language's global proponents. Unfortunately, those who are in the best position to remove this excess demand and consequent poor quality oversupply are the least inclined to do so.

In order to start the ball rolling I have created the Hong Kong Language Needs Assessment Project.

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/index.html

Although dedicated almost entirely to Hong Kong, the project has important implications for the rest of East Asia, where I hope someday to move it forward under a different name. The purpose of the project is to assess the real use and need of the English language in Hong Kong and eventually other East Asian societies and thereby provide policy makers and individual citizens with the information they require to make proper choices with regard to English language training and learning. The first important stage of this project is research, and it is to this end that the following proposal was developed and money, or alternatively employment, is now being sought

 $\underline{http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/documents/proposals/030828-1.pdf}$

Please consider the project and research proposal carefully and think about ways

East Asian Research and Translation in Hong Kong

I am looking forward to your timely response.

Sincerely,

John Audley

mailto: jaudley@ceip.org

Senior Associate and Director

Carnegie Endowment for International Peace

Hong Kong, 03/09/24 HKLNA-Project -- The beginning of a solution

Dear Mr. Audley,

Twelve years on the ground in East Asia has taught me that the world is not yet ready for a universally shared common language. In the simplest of terms there are too many people learning English to provide adequate training to non-native speakers and insufficient real demand to help them sustain what they have learned after having been trained. Moreover, there are too few people learning the languages of non-English speaking peoples to provide a sufficiently strong foundation for good cross-cultural communication and understanding. As a result the overall quality of the English language has suffered, East Asian languages have been neglected, and understanding between peoples of East Asia and the West has been impaired. The obvious solution to this problem is to remove the artificial demand for English language created by East Asian governments and the language's global proponents. Unfortunately, those who are in the best position to remove this excess demand and consequent poor quality oversupply are the least inclined to do so.

In order to start the ball rolling I have created the Hong Kong Language Needs Assessment Project.

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/index.html

Although dedicated almost entirely to Hong Kong, the project has important implications for the rest of East Asia, where I hope someday to move it forward under a different name. The purpose of the project is to assess the real use and need of the English language in Hong Kong and eventually other East Asian societies and thereby provide policy makers and individual citizens with the information they require to make proper choices with regard to English language training and learning. The first important stage of this project is research, and it is to this end that the following proposal was developed and money, or alternatively employment, is now being sought

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/documents/proposals/030828-1.pdf

Please consider the project and research proposal carefully and think about ways

East Asian Research and Translation in Hong Kong

I am looking forward to your timely response.

Sincerely,

Mark Strauss

mailto: mstrauss@ceip.org
Senior Editor, Foreign Policy
Carnegie Endowment for International Peace

Hong Kong, 03/09/24 HKLNA-Project -- The beginning of a solution

Dear Mr. Strauss,

Twelve years on the ground in East Asia has taught me that the world is not yet ready for a universally shared common language. In the simplest of terms there are too many people learning English to provide adequate training to non-native speakers and insufficient real demand to help them sustain what they have learned after having been trained. Moreover, there are too few people learning the languages of non-English speaking peoples to provide a sufficiently strong foundation for good cross-cultural communication and understanding. As a result the overall quality of the English language has suffered, East Asian languages have been neglected, and understanding between peoples of East Asia and the West has been impaired. The obvious solution to this problem is to remove the artificial demand for English language created by East Asian governments and the language's global proponents. Unfortunately, those who are in the best position to remove this excess demand and consequent poor quality oversupply are the least inclined to do so.

In order to start the ball rolling I have created the Hong Kong Language Needs Assessment Project.

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/index.html

Although dedicated almost entirely to Hong Kong, the project has important implications for the rest of East Asia, where I hope someday to move it forward under a different name. The purpose of the project is to assess the real use and need of the English language in Hong Kong and eventually other East Asian societies and thereby provide policy makers and individual citizens with the information they require to make proper choices with regard to English language training and learning. The first important stage of this project is research, and it is to this end that the following proposal was developed and money, or alternatively employment, is now being sought

http://homepage.mac.com/moogoonghwa/earth/current/hklna/documents/proposals/030828-1.pdf

Please consider the project and research proposal carefully and think about ways

East Asian Research and Translation in Hong Kong

I am looking forward to your timely response.

Sincerely,

